This perhaps will be the last Honor Roll submitted by me ni that connection. I must say that the extra work it requires on my part is many times off set with the results it brings. Here is hoping that my successor will continue the good work.

In leaving the managership of the Farmers CoOperative Creamery of Holt I assure you it is not because I am dissatisfied nor tired of the work and community. To be frank with you I can truthfully say that I have enjoyed my work very much as well the people of the community and the Village of Holt. I feel that I have many friends in this community, more friends than anywhere else. I have some very close and true friends, the kind that you do not meet everv day. I hope to continue my friendship up here even tho my presence will not be here only as it might happen, you know, it would be impossible to stay away from Holt when they have some community doing. Those get-together meetings are what has helped the Holt community in building up their fine community spirit. Keep it up is my last word to you.

Even tho I will not be here I am very much interested in your creamery Continue giving your manager the same loyal support that you gave me and I am not worried about the outcome. I feel justified in saying that few creameries are in better condition from a standpoint of loyal patrons as well it financial condition. Let me urge upon every patron in doing your bit in helping the new manager in order that he may continue the progress still further.

He can do nothing without your support. Always remember that a total stranger is working under a handicap which often causes mistakes that unintentionally occur. In such case let me hope you are all big enough to give your operator a chance to correct it without feeling that he is trying to get away with something. I know from experience that no one regrets those errors and misunderstadings more than the operator. Should you at any time feel that you not been used squarely take your trouble to the manager and let him be the first one to know about it. There is nothing that hurts more than to have someone tell everybody else that he meets on the main street what the buttermaker did to him. Let me say to you all that if I know you as I think I do that I feel certain that you will do your part in making this the best creamery in the northwest.

Just a word regarding your present board of directors. Some of them have been on the board for at least fifteen years, some not so long. They are men that you can trust your affairs with and are faithful to the last inch.

They are outspoken in their opinions but big enough to abide with the wishes of the mojority. It shall be my wish that men of their type continue to serve on your board of director.s

In closing I want to thank one and all for the part you took in the farewell party given for the P. L. Anderson family. It was a sendoff that we shall never forget. As I stated that evening, I leave this community with very little money but it gives me much more satisfaction to leave knowing that we have many friends in the community we spent so many years in.

I thank you
P. L. Anderson.

Short Lessons in Dairying

LESSON XXXXVIII

SUBSTANCE IN FEEDS: Protein, the most valuable substance in feeds and the one most apt to be deficient, is contained in different kinds of feeds in different amounts. It runs from 1 per cent and less in straw to 12 per cent in alfalfa hay, and 37 per cent in cottonseed meal. In corn, barley, oats and bran it runs from 8 to 12 per cent. In timothy hay and fodder corn it is around 3 per cent. In potatoes and roots it is only around 1 per cent.

Carbohydrates, the second important substance in feeds, is generally plentifull in all farm grown feeds running from 20 to 70 per cent. Corn and barley are high in carbohydrates containing upward of 65 per cent. Hay and fodder contain from 40 to 50 per cent. Roots contain from 5 to 10 per cent and potatoes 16 per cent.

In making up rations for dairy cows it is important to consider the composition of different feeds so they may be combined in the right amount. Dairy cows use the substances above mentioned in the proportion of around 1 pound of protein to 7 pounds of carbohydrates.

The Free Scholarships

A notable step forward in behalf of better farming in the Northwest has been inaugurated by John W. Black, president of the John W. Black investment banking house of Minneapolis, which also owns several thriving banks in Minnesota and other nearby states.

Three of the banks in question, located at points of vantage in Northern Minnesota, are awarding free scholarships in an agricultural college to the successful candidate, irrespective of sex, selected in each community by a committee of five citizens. These scholarships include tuition, room and board, books and other incidental expenses.

The purpose back of the donation of these scholarships by the Northern Minnesota banks is to encourage scientific methods of farming in each community.

In other words it is the belief of Mr. Black and his associates that each boy and girl sent to an agricultural school by these banks will return home better qualified to make an acre of ground, a dairy cow or the livestock produce a profit by the application of modern, scientific methods to the operation of a farm. And it is the further hope of the banks and Mr. Black that other farmers in the cummunity, realizing the success that the agricultural school student is obtaining, will be encouraged to go and do likewise.

Here, again, in the good work that Mr. Black and his banks are undertaking, is well illustrated the the great service that the bank of today can extend to its community. The time surely, has passed when a bank can expect to thrive alone by the old-time expedient of counting its profits on loans and discounts or by the investments of the deposits of its customers. The successful bank of this generation must see to it also that the community in which it is doing business is a thriving communitp. It must help develop the business of its farmer patrons no less than that of its merchant and professional customers. This can be done by encouraging the work of county agents and of any influence that spells improvement of dairy herds and livestock; by proposing the use of labor and time saving machinery, and in general, as these scholarships will do, by inducing farmers to apply the known scientific farming methods that are sure to produce a profit out of operating a farm.—Commercial West.

The above article was taken from the Commercial West and explains well all about the free scholarship. The three thriving banks in Northern Minnesota, to award a free scholarship from each bank are: The Marshall County State Bank, Holt, First National Bank, of Thief River Falls and The Merchants State Bank of St. Hilaire.

When Food Sours

Lots of folks who think they have "indigestion" have only an acid condition which could be corrected in five or ten minutes. An effective anti-acid like Phillips Milk of Magnesia soon restores digestion to normal.

Phillips does away with all that sourness and gas right after meals. It prevents the distress so apt to occur two hours after eating. What a pleasant preparation to take! And how good it is for the system! Unlike a burning dose of soda—which is but temporary relief at best—Phillips Milk of Magnesia neutralizes many times its volume in acid.

Statistics show that the length of the average human life is steadily increasing and is much greater than it was half a century or a century ago. THE AUCTION FANS

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

"DO YOU know, Dora," Mrs. Archer said, pointing excitedly to a small yellow handbill she had in her hand, "that there's to be an auction, over on Miller avenue at one o'clock this afternoon? A family by the name of Carter are selling everything they have. They are going away, I guess. I called Mary France and she said the Carters had only been housekeeping a few years and their things ought to be as good as new. She said she would be ready to go when we came by. I want you to go with me—you can, can't you?"

"Why, I don't know," said Mrs. Frisby doubtfully, "I haven't much money I can take, I bought so much at that auction last week that I've been short of housekeeping money all this week. I've had to crimp awfully and Jack asked me this morning if he was to expect corned beef hash and rice pudding again today. I don't know why he said that, seeing I've only served it—let me see," and she thoughtfully counted a moment and then said with a startled look at her friend. "Why, I believe I've served it five times lately. Oh, dear, I don't see how I dare go, Fanny."

"Oh, pshaw!" protested Mrs. Archer. "It won't kill Jack Frisby to eat hash and rice pudding is wholesome enough for anyone. And the chance of going to such an auction as this one over on Miller avenue is an opportunity of a lifetime. There isn't much I want, but still it won't do any harm to go and see what they've got. It won't cost anything just to look."

"No-o—I suppose not," said Mrs. Frisby, visibly weakening. "Maybe I'll go, but I mustn't stay long." And so it was settled.

The two women started out after hurriedly cooked dinners. They did not even take time to wash their dishes, simply piled them in the dishpan and threw dish-towels over them.

On their way over they stopped for Mrs. French.

"I know what I'd catch," said Mrs. French, "if Fred French knew I was going to another auction. The last time I went I bought a lot of kitchen utensils and when Fred went after them he had a perfect fit over my purchases. He found holes in every single piece I had bought. But then I tried to tell him a little solder would make 'em as good as new. And land knows I got the whole mess for almost nothing."

"Well," said Mrs. Frisby, "did you get it mended?"

"Um—um, not yet," answered Mrs. French. "To tell the truth, I haven't had time. They are piled up out there in my woodshed, but as I tell Fred they'll come in handy. Any day some of my things may give out and then I'll have those things to fall back on."

Arriving at the auction the three friends were quite disgusted to find that the auctioneer had already begun to sell and there was no chance to look the things over that were going to be sold. They would, if they bid, just have to buy a cat in the bag, as it were.

The three women were shy at first and stood a little apart from the group of people who were bidding, but gradually their curiosity overcame their determination not to bid and they moved up and finally joined the rest of the crowd. None of them bid for a while. Finally the auctioneer had his assistant bring out several baskets piled high with nondescript things and a bit of fun entered into the bidding. The baskets and contents—good, bad and indifferent—were to be sold to the highest bidder. The women craned their necks in a frantic effort to catch a glimpse of the contents of the several baskets, but the auctioneer kept them discreetly behind him. The one that was to be bid on he placed on a table by his side. It was so far above the heads of the bidders that nothing could actually be seen. It was positively thrilling.

"Here's you chance!" sang out the auctioneer, who was a young fellow with piercing black eyes, with a glint of fun in them. "Here's your chance to get your money's worth! Every one of these baskets contains more than a dozen articles that are just what you will be crying for in less than a week if you don't seize this grand opportunity I am offering. I'll start this basket at one dollar—make it one-fifty—one-fifty, make it two—" and he laughed and looked directly into Fanny Archer's face. Here's a chance that will make you the envy of your neighbors—two dollars—make it two-fifty—" Fanny Archer got confused and bid two-sixty, thereby starting the bid for the basket. Mrs. Frisby had been peering and thought she had a glimpse of something that looked like brass and as the auctioneer caught her eye, just then she said: "Two seventy." And then the fun began. It wasn't a moment before there were six or seven women bidding frantically against each other. The basket was finally struck off to Mrs. Jack Frisby for $5.30. Dora was too much excited to even take a peek at the contents of her basket, so anxious was she to get her treasure home. She hired little George Freer to carry it home in his roller-coaster wagon and without even a look in the direction of her two friends she hurried away in the wake of Georgie, fearing that he might not be careful in handling [illegible] ever her excitement began to evaporate. The $6 she had left from her housekeeping money was nearly gone and the washing would be home this very night She was out of everything to eat, too. She had intended stopping at the store on her way home to make some necessary purchases, but now there was only seventy cents in her pocketbook—there would be only sixty cents when she paid Georgie for bringing the basket home.

As she was slowly going up her front walk following Georgie, who should come around the corner of the house but Jack, her husband. When he saw George Freer and the basket and his wife he sensed at once what had happened.

"Been to that auction over on Miller avenue, Dora?" he asked.

"Yes, I have," said Dora with blazing cheeks. She was ready to cry with nervousness.

"Well," said Jack, "let's see what you've got," and he began to sort out the contents of the basket. First he took out three or four dilapitated vases which never having cost more than a quarter were absolutely worthless now from nicks and cracks; here was an old wash bowl and pitcher, two or three hand lamps, and a few other articles which were quite worthless and last of all he removed a big brass door plate with a name engraved upon it.

"Bless me," said Jack with a twinkle in his good-natured eyes. "What are you going to do with this, Dora? I don't see how you are going to use this unless I die and you marry a man who bears the name engraved on this plate. What say?"

This was too much for poor Dora and she burst into tears.

Her husband let her cry a moment, then in sight of all the neighbors he put his arm about her and led her into the house.

"I was afraid you'd get roped in by the auction, so I came home, but I see I didn't get here in time. I saw Carter downtown and he said his wife had always had a perfect passion for picking up old junk and they were making this auction to get rid of it. They are going away, I guess, but Carter said his wife was worn out sorting and caring for all the truck she had in the house. She couldn't bear to throw it away after she had bought it and the house finally had got so full that there wasn't room for the family. Now what do you think of that, Dora?" Jack asked.

"I think," Dora said, soberly, "that I'm done with auctions forever—and Jack, dear, I also think I've got the best husband in the world."

"Enough said," said Jack heartily, "and now shall I tell George to take that basket of junk away?"

Dora could only nod gratefully.

Over-Sensitive Person Prey to Unhappiness

There is neither virtue nor comfort in hyper-sensitiveness. Those who are born with it are to be pitied, and those who cultivate it as a sign of temperament are fools. Both types should make haste to get rid of it. It is sheer storing up of trouble for the future, the fostering of and ever-increasing susceptibility to small hurts that can rise to the magnitude of a nervous breakdown in later life. It puts lines on faces and an edge in the voice.

Set your mind on essential things and people. Keep straight on toward your goal, deaf to belittling remarks and oblivious of sneers, ignoring all the little pinpricks that can perforate your ordinarw daily happiness. After all, happiness is mostly concerned with the everyday things. Tremendous, overwhelming joys are as rare as overwhelming tragedies, and overbearing opposition as infrequent as petty obstruction is common. Realize now trifling it all is, and realize, too, that to respond to every gibe and thrust is to become increasingly petty oneself.

This is the basis of the family tiff. Even the meanest of folks have something of the clan spirit, and would rally round a member of the family against whom an outsider made thrusts. This persists as mere tribal instinct, if for no higher reason. But it is the family itself who too often deals in pinpricks, for the simple reason that it knows so well its members' weaknesses. It knows the joint in the armor that can be penetrated. But there is no encouragement to prick if the pricked can't be made to squeal. —Exchange.

Phalanx in Battle

The phalanx formation was the order of battle in which the ancient Greek hoplites, or heavy infantry, were formed in an unbroken line, several ranks deep. Especially, the famous Macedonian body of soldiers arranged so as to be from 8 to 16 ranks deep and armed with lances 14 to 16 feet long. The lances of each rank (except the first) projected over the shoulders of the men in front of it, and the shields could be locked into a testudo. The strength of this body consisted in its power of resistance and of onset; but it could not readily change front, defend itself against an attack on the flank, or reform if once broken. Its actual numbers varied from 10,000 to 20,000. The Macedonians were the first people to use the phalanx formation.

Mechanical Automata

"Robot" is a coined word invented by Karel Capek for his play, "R. U. R." The term describes mechanical automata, which are manufactured by the millions to attend to the world's labor and welfare. The word is pronounced with the "o's" long and "r" silent

Considering Culture

"Some folks put in so much time wonderin' why God A'mighty made 'em so much better than other folks that they never find out how much less than other folks they really be."—Preachin' Bill.

CULTURE?

Yes, I looked it up in the dictionary It appears to be a fairly large word—extends from Prometheus to prohibition, which you will allow is a long reach—and takes in about everything from growing potatoes to making beer, which is not so far, perhaps, looking at it from an alcoholic point of view.

Yes, I said potatoes—solanum euberosum, you know—edible, farinaceous, tubers.

Well, if your crop turns out to be fine, fat, smooth, husky, white and mealy, it is because your culture is 100 per cent efficient. But if your field of Jerusalem artichokes yields nubby, scrubby, scabby, soggy specimens your culture is all wrong. And when you dray Early Rose, Bliss Triumphs, Burbanks, Beauty of Hebron, or Irish Cobbler where you expected Early Ohio, that, too, is a result of culture.

All of which seems reasonable enough when you remember that human spuds act much the same way.

Exactly! The variety and the quality of the male and female human vegetable is wholly a matter of culture.

Of course, one must start with good seed. We have no right, either, on the ground of science or common sense, to expect fine minds, husky bodies and white souls from nubby, scrubby, scabby, soggy seed stock.

Yes, I know I have said something like that before. I expect to keep on saying it in one way or another. Because until we are willing to give at least as much attention to growing men and women as the average farmer gives to his potatoes, we are a long, long way from comprehending culture—even when we look it up in the dictionaries.

But it is not enough to start with good seed. The ground in which the seed is planted must be right. The soil must have just those elements which potatoes require. In other words: the environment must be such that every little boy and girl potato in the hill will have exactly the right material out of which to make itself into a full-grown, well-matured and creditable individual.

And we must not overlook cultivation. Culture and cultivation are very nearly twins. No matter how good the seed, or how rich the soil, if the ground is not stirred occasionally to let the air in and to keep the weeds out; if the soil—I mean environment—is allowed to become hard and caked and overrun with weeds which take all its strength; or if the good soil is not drawn protectingly close around the little tubers, the crop will fall short of what it might have been.

Is there anything sadder to see than the men and women who might have been?

Oh yes, about the beer!

It seems that different cultures produce different beers. You can easily look up the subject yourself.

Don't worry! Brother Volstead never said that we should not even talk about beer.

Well, as I understand it, this culture is a sort of yeast, and the different brewing results are obtained by using different kinds of yeast.

Yes, yeast—y-e-a-s-t—the stuff which ferments, works, stirs up, puts in the spirit, you know—the inspiration.

I am told by those who are experienced in such things that beer without inspiration is a dull, lifeless, flat, stale, worthless sort of thing. And I know from my own personal observation what poor, tasteless good-for-nothing humans are brewed when there is a lack of the right kind of inspirational yeast.

Indeed yes—absolutely, cultural inspiration is the very life of good character brewing. It is the spirit which distinguishes the real from the near.

To some culture is a matter of geography—to live on a certain street, in a certain district, city, or state. To others it is a question of archeology—having nothing to do with present-day living. To others it is a religion—a thing to bow down before in worship. To others it is a disease—something which one catches as one catches mumps or measles.

Certainly, there is such a thing as oyster culture. Heaven above! Don't you know about that? In every community in the land there are more or less extensive neighborhood beds of these culture-oysters—flabby, slick, slippery, cold, heartless, barely alive things in shells of conventionalism.

The book says that culture is the "improvement or refinement of mind, morals, tastes."

I like that. Mind and morals are inseparable and taste is one with them. That which one thinks, habitually, one is morally; and that which one is determines one's tastes.

And so, you see, people whose minds are filled with selfish, cruel, obscene, vicious thoughts, and whose indecent tastes would shame any red, yellow, black or brown savage, are not cultured. No matter what street they live on, who their forefathers were, what school they attended, or what church they belong to—they are not cultured. They may speak seven languages, or write books about nothing at all, in passable English, or be at home in the social capitals of the world, but if their minds, morals and tastes are those of degenerates they are not cultured.

Yes, culture is "enlightenment or civilization." But that is good only so far as it goes. Between you and me we need more light on our enlightenment. We need light enough to see and recognize in our civilization those forces which are pulling us down into darkest savagery.

For all practical purposes if one thinks like a Hottentot, feels like a Hottentot, and acts like a Hottentot, one is a Hottentot.

They tell me that "bouillon is a cultural media." And that must be so because so much of our culture these days is "in the soup."

It seems never to have occurred to some of us that culture is not a means to an end but is in itself an end. We desire culture for what we think it will bring us; not because we understand that culture is a way of living and wish to live that way.

The one who has little culture often talks much about it; while those who have most seldom speak of it.

There is nothing in the world that can be counterfeited with such universal success, and there is no counterfeit thing that is so easily detected.

Those who possess the genuine thing never boast of having it, but those who have the counterfeit cry their possession from the housetops for fear they will not be recognized as one of the elect.

The authorities say: "Of all species of fish except shad those of the salmon family prove to be the best adapted for artificial culture." But I am not so sure about that; it is my opinion that the authorities are in error. They seem not to be acquainted with certain queer fish with which I am familiar. Shad and salmon may be fairly good for some cultural purposes, but I doubt if anything that swims in river, lake or sea can compare with certain human fish in adaptability for artificial culture.

Do you suppose, though, that there may be a difference between artificial culture and culture which is artificial? And do you know, by any chance, if the shad and salmon receive this artificial culture in schools?

I sat at dinner, one time, with a goodly company of people. They were painters, sculptors, writers and others who like to have such around.

I still have an uneasy feeling that the conversation would have been edifying to me if only I could have discovered what it was all about.

At last a faint gleam of light penetrated the darkness which enveloped me. One of the he-authors drove home the point of whatever it was he thought he was saying with a French phrase, and a distinct cultural thrill went round the board.

"I beg your pardon," said I, timidly, "but I do not understand French. Just what did you say?"

A pitying silence followed my humiliating confession. The gentleman graciously condescended to explain: "Why, you see, Wright," he murmured gently, "there are some ideas and thoughts which I simply cannot express in English, you know."

"Oh," said I humbly, "but was there not a writer called Shakespeare, who did fairly well in English? And there was one Emerson, I believe, who is generally credited with having thought a few man-sized thinks. And I have heard of one or two others. Do you, sir, really have ideas and thoughts which you cannot express in English? I envy you! More than ever before I wish now that I understood French."

The silence became a trifle thicker. The man with the thoughts which could not be expressed in English, said nothing, but he did not look happy.

Then, for once in my life, I was inspired; it came in one great, glorious flash: "As a matter of fact, sir," I said, "you do not understand French, do you? That French phrase which you used you gleaned from a book of phrases like the 'Standard Dictionary of Facts.'"

And, sure as you live, I had hit on the exact truth of that high-browed fish's culture.

Never since that day when Balaam's ass rebuked her rider has human intelligence been treated to such exhibitions of colossal impudence as these asses show at every opportunity. And the scriptural ass was justified. She, poor beast, was caught in a jam between the angel's sword and Balaam's cudgel. But these artificial cultural asses have not the shadow of an excuse for their impudent mouthings.

Verily, it is better to think in one language than to be thoughtless in several.

A culture-hero I find is "an prehistoric hero regarded as the author of an advanced culture and civilization."

There is an ambition for you, my hero-worshiping, medal-craving young friend! To be the author of an advanced civilization! To look with brave understanding upon this savage, selfish, heartless, warring civilization of ours, and to be the author of something better! To awaken your generation to the true meaning and value of culture—physical, mental, moral, social, political, industrial and commercial culture! To gloriously gather to your own heart the critical spears of the jeering enemies of culture, and make a way for decent, kindly, helpful living!

SAME PRESCRIPTION HE WROTE IN 1892

When Dr. Caldwell started to practice medicine, back in 1875, the needs for a laxative were not as great as today. People lived normal lives, ate plain, wholesome food, and got plenty of fresh air. But even that early there were drastic physics and purges for the relief of constipation which Dr. Caldwell did not believe were good for human beings.

The prescription for constipation that he used early in his practice, and which he put in drug stores in 1892 under the name of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, is a liquid vegetable remedy, intended for women, children and elderly people, and they need just such a mild, safe bowel stimulant.

This prescription has proven its worth and is now the largest selling liquid laxative. It has won the confidence of people who needed it to get relief from headaches, biliousness, flatulence, indigestion, loss of appetite and sleep, bad breath, dyspepsia, colds, fevers. At your druggist, or write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. BB, Monticello, Illinois, for free trial bottle.

Scientists Unable to Do Away With Fogs

On a small scale and in favorable circumstances fog can be dispelled, but all known methods are too costly for commercial use, and so could not be applied on the vast scale on which many fogs occur, even were they of proved use. A great deal of time and labor has been seriously expended in the effort to suppress fog. The London county council has from time to time given some encouragement to various schemes presented, but all have failed. No less a distinguished scientist than Sir Oliver Lodge has struggled with this problem and he thought he had solved it, but practical demonstration of his electrical scheme failed. Various suggestions have been made to clear aviation landing places, but all have been discarded and the solution of the problem seems to be no nearer than it ever was.

Will Cold Worry You This Winter?

Some men throw-off a cold within a few hours of contracting it. Anyone can do it with the aid of a simple compound which comes in tablet form, and is no trouble to take or to always have about you. Don't "dope" yourself when you catch cold; use Pape's Cold Compound. Men and women everywhere rely on this amazing little tablet.—Adv.

It is not wise to use remedies which depend upon "dope" such as narcotics, chloroform, cannabis or tar products. They may stop your cough temporarily by numbing the tissues, as most cough mixtures do, but this is not enough.

The inflamed air passages must be soothed naturally, the germ-laden mucus loosened and expelled in order to effect a lasting recovery.

John's Mother Praises Doctor

There isn't a mother living who won't agree that no half-sick child should be the subject for an experiment with medicines of uncertain merit. When your child is bilious, headachy, half-sick, feverish, restless, with coated tongue, bad breath, no appetite or energy, you know that nine times out of ten it's a sign his little stomach and bowels need purging. And when you know that for over fifty years leading physicians have endorsed one preparation for this condition, there doesn't seem to be any reason for "trying" things.

Rich, fruity California Fig Syrup clears the little stomach and bowels gently, harmlessly and in a hurry. It regulates the bowels, gives tone and strength to them and to the stomach; and helps to give your child new strength, energy and vitality. Thousands of Western mothers praise it. Mrs. Joseph W. Hill, 4306 Bedford Ave., Omaha, Nebraska, says: "I'll never forget the doctor who got me to give my baby boy, John, California Fig Syrup. Nothing else seemed to help his weak bowels. That was when he was just a baby. He suffered a good deal before I gave him Fig Syrup, but it stopped his trouble quick. I have used it with him for colds and little upset spells ever since. I consider him a Fig Syrup boy."

Insist on the genuine article. See that the carton bears the word "California." Over four million bottles used a year.

Vindication Comes Late

After twenty-six years Prof. A. W. Bickerson, pioneer of the theory of cosmic evolution to which modern research is beginning to give support, has been honored by New Zealand university, which dismissed him because his views on science were considered unsound. Recently Professor Bickerson, now an old man, living in London, received a cablegram saying the university had recognized its mistake, and it had given him the title of professor emeritus of his former college that had dismissed him so unceremoniously.

THE STORY

Influenced by loneliness, without relatives, or real friends, in Chicago, Lolita Forbes, young and pretty, yields to the importunities of Harvey Torrence, with whom she fancies herself in love She discovers his true character and leaves him, taking refuge with an acquaintance, Gertrude Watson.

CHAPTER II

Lolita wakened in the morning, long after Gertrude had gone to work. She sprang up and reached for the 'phone to call the store, grateful that Gertrude had thoughtfully permitted her to get all of the sleep that she could in view of the events of the night before. When she had gotten her department at the store she started to speak glibly:

"Do!" said Miss Truxton a little irritably; "I need you badly." Lolita hung up the receiver and sat thinking. How easily, almost unconsciously her mind had formed a lie. She had been fully intent upon telling Miss Truxton that she was ill and could not come down to work. By what easy, imperceptible stages one slipped down. Before coming to Chicago it would have taken her a long time to decide to tell a lie, and then she would only have told it if it were to protect some one else, and there were no other possibly way out; since meeting Harvey, and since learning to tell the little lies that she had constantly had to tell to people in connection with him, lying had become almost as easy of accomplishment as breathing. She shuddered. In the clear light of morning, fighting back and up did not seem such an easy thing to do—and, after all, was it really worth while? Being bad probably got no one anything but unhappiness; but, on the other hand, what did being good get one, after all?

Dressing before the mirror Lolita recalled the words of the girl in the dance hall the night before. She did look innocent, and sort of fresh and young. Her cheeks, even immediately after arising, were pink and healthy looking; her eyes were deep blue and bright, her short bobbed hair, all ruffled up and crinkled, shone and glistened like fresh straw under sunlight. After all, she thought with some satisfaction, she was as pretty as she had ever been in her life, prettier. The thought was tremendously reassuring.

As she sat pulling on her stockings, pleasantly enjoying the feel of soft, sleazy pink silk against silky, pink skin the wall 'phone rang sharply. Somehow she felt that it was Harvey She could hear the blood pound in her ears. The 'phone rang again, insistently. Probably he had simply asked them to ring Gertrude Watson's room, thinking that she might be there, with Gertrude still. He had met Gertrude at the store and knew her slightly. Presently the 'phone stopped ringing and Lolita finished dressing carefully. As she opened the door to pass out into the hall she almost ran into a man who stood leaning against the door jamb, a cigarette between his lips, his hat at a jaunty angle.

"Well," he said, without apparent surprise; "they told me Gertrude hadn't gone out."

"It was you, then, who called up on the 'phone." Lolita was conscious of a silly little inward pang at the thought that it hadn't, after all, been Harvey.

"Yes, and I came up here to stand and wait. Sometimes Gertrude gets nutty and won't let me in."

"I see," returned Lolita stiffly She made as if to pass him, but he made no motion to get out of her way."

"You sure are a pretty kid," he observed carelessly "How did you come to be in here, anyhow?"

"Let me by, please," said Lolita stiffly "I am on my way to work and already late."

"If you're already late, why go at all? I [illegible] you up [illegible] breakfast, [illegible] a cocktail." Again she tried to [illegible] past him, but this time he de[illegible] blocked the way and, in fact [illegible] toward her so that she was [illegible] back into the room. Entering, he closed the door after him. Lolita [illegible] toward the 'phone upon the wall but his easy laugh made her pause with her hand upon the receiver.

"Call them if you like, but I'm the one lucky man who is allowed to run around this place you see, my dad owns it."

Lolita felt that he was telling the truth He had the appearance of a young man who was accustomed to [illegible]. His clothes were faultless, evidently tailor made, and he had that indefinable air of complete assurance that is indelibly associated with ready money. He was not, she reflected irrelevantly, really bad looking; in fact, he was quite distinctly good looking She turned to face him.

"If you don't go, I shall open the window and call out. You ought to be arrested, forcing your way in here like this."

"How do I know but what you ought to be arrested?" he countered. "I find you here in a guest's room, despite the fact that it is strictly against the rules for the girls who live here to have guests overnight without registering them. For all I know you may have been about to ransack the room."

"Don't be silly," snapped Lolita. Again she started for the door.

"Silly, my eye!" he returned inelegantly. "I never was more serious in my life; for that matter, all I've got to do is to 'phone them downstairs to call the wagon and have you taken to the police station and held on suspicion. It would be a long time before the thing would be straightened out, probably twenty-four hours. Ever sleep all night in a police station? I have—it's h—l!" He was apparently very serious. She was appalled at the thought that in all probability it would be easy enough for him to do just as he had indicated, claiming that she was in a guest's room without any apparent right to be there. It would, in fact, be pretty hard to get hold of Gertrude and get the thing straightened out quickly.

"Of course," he added jovially, "I wouldn't do anything like that, but I could easily. Give us a little kiss and we'll call it all square."

"I'm not accustomed to kissing every man I meet," asserted Lolita stiffly, "please let me go."

"My dear girl, if you're hanging around with Gert, there's no use your pulling this 'innocent' stuff, Gertrude is a great little kid, but she's no nun, and her room has never been anything at all like a nunnery." Lolita felt her face flaming. Worst of all was her own secret knowledge that, in one way, she was really no better than Gertrude. She started again for the door. Suddenly he grasped her in his arms. His was brutally strong and had no difficulty in finding her lips with his own He pressed a hot kiss upon her mouth and leaned back exultant, white, breathing in short little gasps. Lolita screamed at the top of her voice. He was a little startled. Holding her firmly by the wrist he walked over to the 'phone and called the office.

"It's all right," he said calmly, and hung up the receiver again His attitude toward her, however, had changed.

"Gee, you're a funny kid to be hanging around with Gertrude," he commented in plain puzzlement. "Tell you what I'll do. If you'll let me drive you down to where you work I'll take you right away, this instant."

"Thanks," she snapped, "but I prefer the Elevated. Let me go at once, or I shall make such a commotion that it will be heard clear out on the street." His eyes blazed, but his voice wheedled.

"Darn it, I'm not going to get fresh with you any more—how could I? My car's an open roadster, and it's broad daylight. Please let me drive you down to work; if you don't I won't let you go. You're sore at me now, and I don't want you to be; I want to apologize and tell you how sorry I am for the way I acted. I can do that while I'm driving you down What's the harm?" Seeing the refusal still in her eyes he added in a surly manner, "D—n it, if you won't let me drive you down, I won't let you go, and if you yell again I'll crack you one alongside of the jaw so that you won't do any more yelling for a week. Now come on, say that I can drive you down."

Selecting the lesser of two evils, she finally consented. Walking downstairs with him, rather than trust herself with him in the automatic lift, which he might halt between the floors, she accompanied him to the snappy little gray roadster which stood at the curb and was just climbing in when a voice that struck a strange sort of surprised terror at her heart sounded at her elbow.

"So that's the kind of a double-crossing —— you are!" came to her startled ears in Harvey's familiar voice. She turned in terror, but before she could speak, there was a sound like an apple being thrown against a brick wall, as the owner of the roadster suddenly crashed his fist against Harvey's jaw.

Leaning against the side of the automobile weakly she watched while the most terrible sight she had ever seen in her life went on before her eyes. She had seen boys fight many times, but she had never before seen grown men engage in a serious encounter. It was almost unbelievably dreadful. The very air seemed to seethe with hate. It was as though thousands of years of civilization had dropped away and both of the men had reverted to the primordial beast. Their faces were expressions such as she had never seen upon men's faces before, not even in pictures of fights in the movies. Their lips were drawn back from their teeth like the lips of a mad dog she had once see. The blows that they delivered were so murderous that it seemed to the girl that each one must surely kill one or the other. Presently the blood began to run in a horrifying stream from Harvey's mouth. A moment later blood issued from the other man's nose. A crowd was beginning to collect. Subconsciously she heard a policeman's whistle give one of those eerie blasts that she had sometimes heard late at night. Suddenly, stooping as though to pick up something from the ground, Harvey's antagonist hit him such a terrific blow upon the chin that his head snapped back as though his neck was broken. He fell to the walk, his head striking the cement curb with a sound more sickening than any of those previous.

Harvey lay very still. His face indescribably softened, even with the blood upon it took on the most innocent, guileless expression that Lolita had ever seen there. At this moment several policemen arrived and unceremoniously shoved their way through the crowd. The son of the owner of the Grantham apartments was leaning against the hood of his car breathing as though his windpipe had been shut off except for a very small passage through which his breath whistled tortuously. He was bloody, it seemed to Lolita, all over. One of his eyes was turning a frightful shade of blue. His collar hung down the back of his coat, his hair was ruffled and his hat was gone. One sleeve of his coat was torn almost off.

An officer who had been leaning over Harvey suddenly straightened up and looked at the others.

"The guy's dead." he said.

CHAPTER III

That night Lolita slept, or rather lay in the dark and stared with wide, frightened eyes at the one electric bulb out in the cement corridor of the woman's annex to the police station.

All afternoon she had read the papers. The girl whom they described as "Lolita" was a girl she didn't at all know, but who had done a few of the things that she had done, thereby making it possible for the rest of the things that had been said to be believed.

It seemed that her mind was numb, so numb that she fortunately did not suffer as much as she would have, had her situation been less terrible.

Toward morning she dropped off into a dream-tortured sleep, only to wake in what seemed like a minute or two when she heard the steel door of the cell being opened.

"Here's your breakfast," said an acid-faced Amazon. "F'llah bought it at the restaurant across the street and sent it in." Lolita looked down wonderingly at two white-and-gold fried eggs, still sizzling, a heap of crisply-brown "American fried" potatoes, some thin, buttered toast and a steaming pot of coffee.

"Who was the fellow?" she asked dully.

Excellent Work Done by the Navy Stations

There is a constant increase in the number of compass stations maintained by the Navy department along the various coasts. The latest statistics available show that 15,374 ship captains were shown their location during heavy fogs last year, and it is fair to assume that at least 10 per cent of them might have been grounded or wrecked had it not been for the assistance given by radio.

A compass station is a wireless plant where special apparatus is used for telling the definite location of a vessel. A ship is lost in the fog; the wireless operator flashes out the signal, "Q. T. E." The station receiving the message adjusts the radio compass to meet the direction from which the message comes. This is the "mechanical ear" of the station and the operator can tell exactly the direction down to a point of the compass Each station getting the message reports to a central station, where calculations are made as to the location of the ship. The distance from shore is told by the strength of the signals. Then within five minutes of the time the vessel sends out the inquiry the reply comes back and the ship's master knows just where he is and pilots his craft accordingly.

New Irish Coinage

The ancient Irish harp will replace the profile of the king on the new coinage of the Irish Free State. The principal features of the industrial and sporting life of the country and its cultural development are represented. But St. Patrick, the national apostle, has not been remembered in designing the new coinage of the realm. A horse, a bull and a hen with a brood represent agriculture. A salmon and woodcock represent sport. A round tower and a wolfhound symbolize the ancient dignity of Ireland. New currency notes and coins will not be in circulation for a few months yet.

Right and Wrong

Maurice Ravel, the French composer, visited a supper club in New York the other night. A young man and a girl came out in due course and did a rather daring and suggestive dance.

"That dance is very difficult," a debutante said to M. Ravel. "I've tried it time and time again, but I don't believe I'll ever be able to dance it the right way."

M. Ravel smiled.

"The right way to dance that dance," he said, "is the wrong way."

How tuberculosis robs boys and girls of their parents is a story that a visit to the children's building at Glen Lake Sanatorium, Hopkins, the State Sanatorium near Walker, or Nopeming Sanatorium, near Duluth, brings home strikingly. If the wistful-eyed tot above, snapped at Glen Lake Sanatorium, could make a speech, how earnestly would she plea for everyone to fight tuberculosis by buying Christmas Seals. This disease has deprived her of a mother's love and care, and made necessary years of preventive treatment to protect her from the disease.

LETTER FROM FLAKNE

Carrollton, Mo.
Dec. 13, 1928

Dear Editor:

Enclosed you will find check for $3.00 to pay for the News. Give my greetings to all my good friends around Holt. I am sorry to see that P. L. Anderson is leaving you. We started a new creamery here two years ago and it is doing as well as most new creameries do at first.

You can make more money clear on your cheap land up in Minnesota than we can down here. Our shipping association shipped 200 carloads of livestock this year. It takes 8 cents to handle it or around $10.00 a car.

Land is starting to move here but most of the farmers are hard up. We got a strong Farm Bureau in the county and, people are now trying to build up their farms and livestock, and cut the cost of production.

yours truly,
Grant I. Flakne.

Returns to Wife Awaiting Divorce

Bayonne, N. J.—Declaring he hasn't had a peaceful minute in the last 14 years, Harold W. Weaver of this city is asking for a divorce from Mrs. Beatrice J. Weaver.

"Oh, back home," Harold replied wearily. "You see, Beatrice wouldn't like it if I stayed away, at least until the decree goes through."

WAR HERO LIKES COMFORTABLE CELL

Shanghai.—George H. Brewster, British subject, war hero and Shanghai beachcomber, is a man who likes his comfortable cell in the Shanghai jail. George says so himself. He's in jail now and will be there for some time to come, all of which makes him quite contented.

Five times did George essay to break into the local jail and five times did a British judge refuse to send him there, because of the man's remarkable war record.

On the occasion of his fourth appearance before the British court George pleaded to be sent to jail. He argued that he was unemployed and hungry; that in prison he had no work to do and got three good meals per day and a place to sleep.

The next day George armed himself with a number of rocks. On busy Nanking road he amused himself by hurling rocks through display windows.

George was arrested.

He pleaded guilty in court and asked for a jail term. The judge was obliging. Three months for George.

"Thank you, sir," was George's comment.

Attacked by Grizzly, Lies Still—and Lives

Livingston, Mont.—Attacked by a hungry grizzly bear near the Canyon hotel in Yellowstone National park, Ben Merrifield, a caretaker at the hotel, was knocked down and severely clawed.

Merrifield, who was unarmed, probably saved his life by remaining motionless after he had been felled by one sweep of the grizzly's paw. Reared on its hind legs the bear attacked Merrifield when he was on his way to an outbuilding for gasoline.

Merrifield was brought here, and physicians said he would recover.

During the park season the grizzlies are fed regularly, but after the park closes the feeding is stopped and they frequently become ferocious.

Dog Shoots Man, Which Accounts for This Item

New York.—"You have always told me," said the young man to the editor, "that when a dog bites a man that's nothing, but when a man bites a dog, that's news."

"Yes," quoth the editor.

Milton Young of Highland, N. Y., went hunting recently near the neighboring town of Accord. He leaned his shotgun against the running board of his car. One of the two hunting dogs ran beneath the car and knocked over the gun, which fired, sending a charge of shot into Young's right foot. Floyd Lampan, Young's companion, put a temporary dressing on the wounded foot, which was badly lacerated, and drove him to a doctor.

Kills Self, Leaving $400,000 to Family

New Orleans, La.—Although E. C. Cornish, wealthy Southern banker, left two farewell notes to his wife in the hotel room in which his body was found, New Orleans authorities were without a definite reason for the suicide.

One of the notes asserted that "a few years added to or subtracted from eternity make no difference," and another declared he was leaving an estate of about $370,000 to his widow and $38,500 to his daughter, and urged them to invest the money wisely.

Cornish, who shot himself to death, was president of the First American Bank and Trust company of West Palm Beach, Fla., which was closed in June.

Plays Knight Too Well, Spends Night in Jail

Washington.—Because [illegible]erick Brown saw a young woman struggling in front of a store with a man and hastened to the young woman's rescue, he spent the night in jail. After he told his story in court, he was freed.

When Brown interfered he did not know that the woman, accompanied by another, had just a few minutes earlier walked out of the store with five suits of clothes they neglected to pay for. The manager accused Brown of being an accomplice of the two women who escaped.

Just the Nicest Ice Man

By JANE OSBORN

(Copyright.)

THERE was a certain flippancy about Helen's manner and speech that was decidedly disconcerting to her perfectly conventional mother.

"Your remarks are so inconsequential," Mrs. Ross told her. "Half the time I don't know whether you are in jest or in earnest. If you mean what you say then you are extremely silly, and if you don't mean what you say then you are making fun of me and my friends, and that is extremely rude."

Helen was spending this summer at home, or rather at the Ross summer cottage by the sea, and in order to give her mother an opportunity to play all the afternoon bridge that she wanted with the other cottagers and to give herself a little much-needed experience in household matters she with two maids was taking full charge of the housekeeping.

When her mother gave her first porch party of course Helen had to appear, and as a preliminary Mrs. Ross made her little speech about Helen's inconsequential remarks and flippant manner.

Mrs. Mack cornered Helen before the card playing began.

"We never see you at the casino," she accused. "And your mother says you don't play bridge. I do hope you are having a pleasant time. Do you like it here at Seaside?"

"I adore it," answered Helen. "I've been at lots of seashore resorts, but I never knew another where there were such perfectly adorable shells on the beach."

Mrs. Mack raised her haughty eyebrows and gave Helen a searching glance. Helen's mother, who had overheard the remark, also raised her eyebrows and indicated her motherly disapproval of what Helen had said.

"But I really do think the shells are remarkable. There are some lovely pink ones with blushing linings. Don't you ever pick up shells, Mrs. Mack?" The question was not even worth a reply. Mrs. Mack couldn't strap her own shoes or pick up a card that had slipped from the card table.

Later Mrs. Horton engaged Helen in conversation.

"Absolutely," said Helen. "I never saw such an accommodating express man, and we have the nicest ice man. Do you happen to know the ice man, Mrs. Horton?" Mrs. Horton regarded her with the smile she saved for the inmates of the home for feeble-minded orphans of which she was a manager. And Mrs. Ross standing behind Mrs. Horton uttered a sharp, "Helen."

"But really, mother, he is the nicest ice man," insisted Helen. "He can swing a perfectly enormous piece of ice into the refrigerator as if it weighed no more than a feather, and he has the most delicious sense of humor. He's going to have Friday morning off and I'm going to go swimming with him. He knows a new stroke I'm crazy to learn."

"Helen," fairly shrieked her mother, and Mrs. Horton, turning away, smiled compassionately at Mrs. Ross. "Helen, I think you are crazy. Don't you know that Mrs. Horton belongs to one of the best families of the state? The Hortons have the finest cottage in Seaside—she was going to invite you to a dance they're giving—but she'll think we are impossible. Going swimming with an ice man?"

"Well, I'll go to her dance if she'll invite my ice man," laughed Helen. "I'll bet he can dance, too. His name is Mortimer—" But Mrs Ross heard no more. She was wondering whether it wouldn't be a good plan to have Helen psychoanalyzed.

A week later—after Helen had learned the new swimming stroke from Mortimer, the ice man, and had strolled along the beach on a moonlight night with Mortimer's stalwart arm around her waist as they walked—Mrs. Ross told Helen that she had been invited to Mrs. Horton's dance.

"I believe she has been able to get almost as many young men as girls for the party. She has arranged to have some come down from the city—and she has discovered that there is a perfectly charming young man here doing some sort of work—desk clerk or something of that sort at one of the hotels, I suppose—and she has asked him, too. It's a Mr. Mortimer Fitzdavis—he'll be a senior at Harvard next winter. The Fitzdavises have loads of money, but Mr. Fitzdavis has some curious ideas. He believes in paying his sons' expenses through three years in college. The last year they have to pay their own way. I hope you will wear your pink chiffon, Helen. Only it would be much more becoming if you hadn't allowed yourself to get so sunburned."

"Mortimer likes sunburn," said Helen. "His favorite color is green, so I think I had better wear my Nile green organdie."

"Mr. Fitzdavis, you mean—how do you know what he likes—Helen, don't be insane?"

"Mortimer Fitzdavis," said Helen, feeling rather dazed. "He's the perfectly adorable ice man I've been trying to tell you about. We've been walking on the beach—last night in the moonlight. Mother, you wouldn't be very cross or think I was crazy or flip or inconsequential if I told you that I am engaged to Mortimer—would you?"

Christmas Time Clears the Road to Happiness

THINGS were bad.

All year they had been bad, and they were worse. The pile of books lay open, one on top of the other, on the big desk, and sheets of ruled paper covered with figures lay all around, mingled with sheets of scrap covered with penciled calculations.

Bills, bills, bills. And heaven knew where to meet them, or what to meet them with.

Stock on hand that wouldn't move. Debits outstanding that wouldn't come in. Debtors that wouldn't pay, and creditors that wouldn't wait.

Darkness and despair and black hideousness everywhere.

The world no better off than he. The burning match of national hatred hanging low over the powder barrel. Quarrelsome lands and landlets threatening to start another World war.

Great oriental peoples torn by internal turmoil, but slowly turning their hatred from each other to concentrate it on the western races.

War in Europe threatening to give place to war against Europe. Strife in the East slowly preparing the way for strife between East and West.

Why struggle and struggle for ever against the petty troubles of a tiny business world, only to graduate into the greater troubles of a world ready for the melting pot?

Why strive for nothing? Why labor without reward? Why win when there was no prize?

The little drawer opened almost automatically. There beneath his fingers lay the real solution. The short way out. Thumb and forefinger caressed the beautiful, shining breach, the dull metal magazine. It fitted so neatly into his palm.

Now? Why not?

Ding, ding, ding, dong.

Ding, dong.

There was a church across the street.

DING, DONG.

"Hark, the Herald angels sing, Glory . . ."

A choir was singing.

A clock struck midnight. Christmas morning.

The weapon fell useless into the drawer.

Another day, perhaps, but not tonight. If a dying world could sing glory to God, what little, trumpery, tenthrate dry-goodsman had any right to give in?

There was almost a laugh in his voice as he called to the night watchman, on his way home, "Merry Christmas, John."

Christmas Time Brings Angelic Choirs' Refrain

THE heavens bend low above the earth at Christmas time. It is then that the things above join and blend with the things below. It is then that angels and archangels crowd above the Judean hills and the refrain of angelic choirs falls upon the ears of men. It is Christmas time, when the flaming glory of visitors from the sky startles alike sleeping flocks and watching shepherds. At Christmas the stars of heaven find the paths of men and lead the kings of the East to the shrine of the new-born Prince. It is then that the star of Bethlehem shines with the lanterns of weary travelers to greet the Light of the World. It is then that angels and men join in praise to God in the highest, and peace and goodwill mantle the earth.

All these are but small symbols of that finer blending, that richer combination of divine love and human frailty which brought the spirit-born Son of God to live in the flesh-born son of Mary, to be the Christ of God and the Savior of men. At Christmas time heaven looks down to earth and earth looks up to heaven.—William L. Gaston.

No Return Gifts

No Christmas giving, however lavish, is truly generous unless it includes some from whom there can be no return of gifts.

Christmas in Spain

His Gift to the Street Boys' Christmas Dinner

A GENTLEMAN was hurrying toward the big hotel on the corner, bending some to escape the bitter blast. A man approached, holding out a paper.

"Ah, Mr. Thurston, he said. "I'm begging—"

"No, nothing," emphatically.

"But this is very worthy. A Christmas dinner for the street boys—newsboys and all that, you know."

"And I repeat no," shortly. "I'm asked to give something at every corner of the street, No, no."

A few minutes later Mr. Thurston was seated at a table, ordering a generous dinner. A boy came in selling papers, and the man noticed the hungry look in the youngster's eyes as he glanced at the table.

"Sit down here with me, boy," he said. "I want company. Here, waiter," to the man behind, as the boy sat down, "bring this boy turkey with all the fixings. That's what you'd like?" to the boy.

"Yes, sir. Then as he began to fill up, "I'm to have another turkey dinner tomorrow. A street boys' dinner. I gave ninety cents, all I had. I give what I can."

When too full to eat any more he rose. Mr. Thurston drew out a twenty dollar bill and gave it to him.

"Give this as my contribution toward the dinner," he said.—Frank H. Sweet.

People Who Belong to the Christmas Season

THERE are some people who seem to belong to the Christmas season by nature. They are:

Mothers whose eyes still twinkle and laugh when they talk to their children.

Sisters who don't try to economize on brothers' ties.

Houseowners who do not forget that the mailman is entitled to more than the bag of presents he carries for others.

People who never think decorating is any trouble.

People who think there is nothing lovelier than holly.

People who are coy near mistletoe.

People who like Christmas cards.

People who like calendars.

People who like nuts and raisins.

People who like turkey all the week.

People who like plum pudding all the week.

These people seem to belong to the Christmas season by nature.—By Mary Graham Bonner.

One kiss for each berry was the original mistletoe ritual, a berry being removed as a kiss was taken.

Signal He Didn't "Get" Put Heart in Speaker

A man stood before hundreds of women in the assembly room of the hotel, feeling forlorn and frightened. He was addressing the Indiana Federations of Clubs, and as he progressed he yearned for a familiar face, for a token of recognition from a personal friend.

Then three women in the rear of the room waved their hands at him. He took heart for, although he did not recognize them, evidently they were women he knew. From another part of the hall a fourth woman waved. The speaker began to feel at home.

Certainly he must hurry over to those women when he completed and shake hands. They had been as manna to him in the wilderness. Then a fifth woman waved. The chairman of the meeting leaned forward and whispered to the speaker:

"When they wave that way," she explained, "it means they can't hear you."—Indianapolis News.

This Mother Had Problem

As a rule, milk is about the best food for children, but there are times when they are much better off without it. It should always be left off when children show by feverish, fretful or cross spells, by bad breath, coated tongue, sallow skin, indigestion, biliousness, etc., that their stomach and bowels are out of order.

In cases like this, California Fig Syrup never fails to work wonders, by the quick and gentle way it removes all the souring waste which is causing the trouble, regulates the stomach and bowels and gives these organs tone and strength so they continue to act normally of their own accord. Children love its rich, fruity flavor and it's purely vegetable and harmless, even for babies.

Millions of mothers have proved its merit and reliability in over 50 years of steadily increasing use. A Western mother, Mrs. May Snavely, Montrose, California, says: "My little girl, Edna's, tendency to constipation was a problem to me until I began giving her California Fig Syrup. It helped her right away and soon her stomach and bowels were acting perfectly. Since then I've never had to have any advice about her bowels. I have also used California Fig Syrup with my little boy, with equal success."

To be sure of getting the genuine, which physicians endorse, always ask for California Fig Syrup by the full name.

Electric Plows in Italy

Plowing by electricity is proving successful in Italy, according to those who have watched the tests. The plow being used is a V-shaped or double-ended type, which is hauled across the fields by means of a cable. The power is taken from an electric transmission line and passed through a transformer. The cost of operating the machine is said to be less than $8 an acre, but the installation of the equipment is high.

> Influenced by loneliness, without relatives, or real friends, in Chicago, Lolita Forbes, young and pretty, yields to the importunities of Harvey Torrence, with whom she fancies herself in love. She discovers his true character and leaves him, taking refuge with an acquaintance, Gertrude Watson. Lolita is accosted by the son of the wealthy owner of the apartments, Fred Watterson. She repulses his advances, but he insists on driving her to the store. On the street Torrence is waiting. He puts the worst construction on Lolita's being with Watterson, and the two men engage in a fistic battle in which Torrence is killed.

"How the h—l do I know?" responded the matron with a shrug, as she set the things down upon one end of the wooden bench which let down with chains upon the other side of the cell, "you been mixed up with so d—n many of them you probably wouldn't remember which he was if you seen him." Lolita winced. She looked up at the hard face of the matron; it was the hardest face that she had ever seen in her life.

"Do you really believe that I'm as bad as the papers say?" she asked. Incredibly the matron smiled.

"H—l no, kid; I've handled enough hard ones in my time to know better than that. You can't be such a bad kid yet; but you're catching up on the worst I ever saw, pretty fast." With that she slammed the door and was gone. Lolita was so heartened by her words, however, that she ate every bite of the breakfast and finished just in time, for a turnkey soon came to the cell.

"Yer wanted upstairs," he remarked laconically. Her heart thumping, Lolita followed the man upstairs and into the office of the station captain.

"You told this Harvey guy to wait outside the Grantham and beat up young Watterson, didn't you?"

"No!" said Lolita, horrified at the though, "I—"

"Don't lie to me!" roared the captain in a voice which seemed to cause the very floor to vibrate. Lolita shrank back into her chair.

"If you didn't do that," went on the captain, as though he felt that he was stating a self-evident truth, "you told young Watterson that you was hooked up with this Harvey guy so deep that the only way you could break with him was for him to croak him."

"Oh, no, sir; it all happened just as I told you yesterday, I—"

"You're lying to me!" roared the captain again.

Again Lolita shrank back into her chair. Never in all of her life had she been talked to like that. She had never dreamed that there were men on earth who would talk that way to a woman. With horror she began to understand that the situation in which she had placed herself had put her beyond the pale of polity; people did not feel any necessity for treating her as a lady. The captain suddenly leaned toward her, ingratiatory, smiling.

"Tell you what I'll do, kid; I'll get you out of this whole thing, turn you loose, and everything if you'll come clean about the whole affair. Give me the low-down just for my own information. I won't say nothing to nobody, and you'll be sprung. This is on the level."

"I'm sorry, sir," she began, and shrank back again as the kindliness immediately began to fade from his eyes, "but it's all just as I told you yesterday. I told you the whole truth then, and nothing but the truth, really, sir."

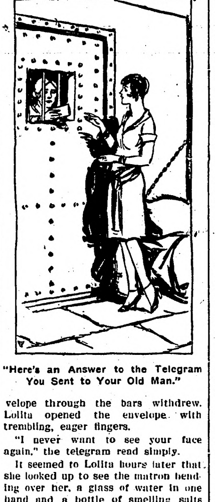
"You're a hard-boiled baby," he told her sternly, "you know how to keep your trap shut, I'll give you credit for that, but it ain't going to do you no good when they get you over to court, because nobody'd believe that hot bull you slipped me yesterday, and the judge'll hand you a couple extra years for lyin' to him."

"Oh, but please—" began Lolita, the tears streaming now down her cheeks; she could feel herself trembling all over as though with the ague. The captain, ignoring her, turned his back and pressed a button on his desk. Almost immediately the door opened and the turnkey motioned for her to follow him.

Back downstairs in the cell again she lay down upon the bunk and cried as she had never cried before in all her life.

She remembered the night before, how Gertrude had convinced her that even despite her misstep she was free to work back along the road that she had gone, to be somebody yet. But Gertrude's easy philosophy had been specious. Life wasn't as easy as that. One couldn't just break moral laws at will and then, when you got tired of it, turn around and go right on where you had left off before your moral vacation. There was the piper to pay, and the piper's fee was always more than adequate. Darkly her mind kept presenting pictures of the state penitentiary at Joliet, women doing the lockstep, coarse food, coarser bedding. Gongs. With shuddering horror she forced her mind to busy itself with other things. That she did not love Harvey, could never have re[illegible] [illegible]ved him, she now knew [illegible] The fact that he was dead made no real difference to her, except as it bore upon her present predicament. She could never go back to work at the Emporium. She could never work anywhere in Chicago again. Every paper in town had contained her picture. She could never go home again; the Elgin papers would have copied the stories—there was absolutely no hope in any direction. Suddenly the matron appeared again outside the door.

"Here's an answer to the telegram you sent to your old man," she said crisply and, handing the yellow envelope through the bars withdrew. Lolita opened the envelope with trembling, eager fingers.



"Here's an Answer to the Telegram You Sent to Your Old Man."

"I never want to see your face again," the telegram read simply.

It seemed to Lolita hours later that she looked up to see the matron bending over her, a glass of water in one hand and a bottle of smelling salts in the other.

"Come, come buck up, kid I think your troubles may be over," she said comfortingly.

For some reason Lolita felt an uncontrollable desire to laugh aloud. She laughed and laughed, while the matron frowned down at her. Presently, when she had forced herself to stop laughing she saw that some one was waiting outside the cell door. It was the turnkey. Terrified at the thought of again being questioned by the captain she grasped hold of the matron's hand with both of her own.

"It's all right," said that lady a little impatiently; "I think you're sprung. Buck up and come along."

Not knowing that the verb "to spring" means to release a prisoner, Lolita followed along knowing not what to expect; but this time she was not taken to the captain's office. She was taken out and rather unceremoniously shoved into a patrol wagon.

As the wagon rushed through the streets Lolita looked miserably from the small barred window, dumbly appreciative of the fact that people were now looking at the patrol wagon and wondering what she had been arrested for, just as she, many times, had done. She remembered what she had always decided women whom she had seen in patrol wagons had been arrested for—the thought was overwhelming. She buried her face in her hands and wept bitterly. One of the two policemen in the wagon leaned over and roughly patted her shoulder.

"Cheer up, kid," he said in a kindly manner. "It's a writ of habeas corpus that's taking you downtown; the chances are you'll be sprung." Never in all of her life had Lolita been so grateful for a kind word and tone, though she had no idea what the words meant. A moment later the wagon stopped and Lolita was assisted out, passed through a gauntlet of cruel, curious eyes, and into a large, forbidding gray stone building.

She was hustled into a courtroom and found herself before a judge who looked as though there was nothing but machinery back of his eyes.

"Whatsa charge?" he snapped at a city prosecutor who stood by, apparently bored.

"She isn't booked," he replied.

"Like to keep her awhile for questioning," returned the prosecutor carelessly.

"You had her for twenty-four hours," reminded the judge.

"O. K. Let her go," agreed the prosecutor. "We can pick her up later for questioning if we want to—haven't enough evidence to hold her—ought to be sent out to city hospital for the usual examination, though."

The judge was about to open his mouth, when a lawyer stepped forward and said a few words which Lolita did not catch.

The judge nodded and looked at her.

"Dismissed," he said curtly. The prosecutor looked queerly at the lawyer and then walked out of the room as though bored with the whole proceeding. Lolita stared at the judge.

"Dismissed," he repeated impatiently, "sprung. You're free. For heaven's sake, what are you staring at?" The lawyer stepped to Lolita's side.

"You are free to go, child," he said quietly, taking her arm and leading her toward the door.

"But why have you done this for me?" she asked him, dazed by the sudden knowledge of liberty when she had expected years of penal servitude.

"Me?" the lawyer laughed. "Why, I did it for money, of course, my dear. There was nothing to it; they had no charge against you."

"But who is going to give you the money?"

"Was it young Mr. Watterson, or his father?"

"Nope, nobody you ever saw in your life; in fact I don't think you ever even heard of him." They were out on the street now. Leading her to a taxi standing at the curb he opened the door and handed her in, and, after she had seated herself he suddenly handed her a sealed envelope, tipped his hat, said a few words to the driver and disappeared in the crowd. As the taxi wheeled, Lolita tore open the envelope. The first thing that greeted her astonished gaze was two one-hundred dollar bills. There was also a folded sheet of white notepaper. She unfolded this and read the typewritten words.

"I hope you've had a lesson that will last you for awhile. You will be taken to a respectable rooming house. Your room rent there is paid for some time in advance. I have talked to the 'Gertrude' person and know exactly what happened. The Gertrude girl is not a half bad little scout. She told me what your ambitions were and I have arranged to let you take a whirl at putting yourself back on your feet, but I would prefer that you stay away from Gertrude in the future. With this money get some more clothes, if you haven't any others, so that you will never have to wear the outfit that the newspaper photographs showed you in. Use the name 'Margaret Farrar' for awhile until this thing has blown over, and dye your hair and wear neutral glasses so you won't be recognized. When you have thoroughly rested up, go to the downtown college of the Southwestern university; I have paid your tuition in advance there for a year. If you do well I may pay it again next year. Don't be a d—n fool; I'm old enough to be your father, and have no 'intentions' of any kind toward you. If you don't do as I tell you I'll wash my hands of you, and you will probably get into worse trouble than you are already. The least you can do, in return for what little I have beeen able to do for you, is to follow out my instructions to the letter."

Europe's Art Objects Really Second Rate?

The treasury of Europe, that vast litter of the work of their grandfathers, which the posters preach, is as miscellaneous and unequal as a jackdaw's swag in the hollow tree, and no one knows the good from the bad, declares William Bolitho in Vanity Fair.

"All artistic criticism," declares this iconoclast, "is as dead in Europe as was scientific in the Middle ages. The same Frenchman who insists that you do the dusty journey to wind-swept Versailles to worship the monstrous palace, where even the impenetrable stolidity of an architect who could make over three hundred yards of bays in exact repetition cannot disguise the ill-judged megalomania of the monarch who insisted that his father's hunting box should be built into the center of the largest palace in the world, will rush you with a sickly smile past the magnificent and serene Eiffel tower.

"The grand staircase of the Chateau of Blois is stuck on and superfluous; the greatest German cathedral, Cologne, is nakedly, appallingly out of scale, too short for its height, and instead of that lovely Gothic sensation of soaring to the heavens, gives the spectator a dull pain between the eyes; detailed mention of all instances that clutter my memory would not exhaust the case." Whether good or bad, he concludes, anything built before 1840 is reverenced as being artistic.

The Mushrat

Nine-year-old Joe is still wondering why his mother and father were both seized with a coughing fit when he gave them this masterpiece of his own composition to read:

The mushrat is about 3 times as big as a ornery house rat. he has a plump figur and round head He is brown on his body but no hear on his tale. His house is round and made of lily-roots and cattales. in winter if he is frozen in he eats the lily-roots of his house. His Habits are good if he lives not near farms. If he gets a carrot he gose to a elevat place where he can jump of at the first sine of danger. He is used for mushrat cotes.

Take time to deliberate, but when the time for action arrives, stop thinking and go in.

Insisted "Well-Paid" Dominie Should Work

Bishop Lawrence of Boston, who has just been appointed bishop in charge of the American Episcopal churches of Europe, was the head of the church pension fund that raised over $10,000,000 in 1916, and naturally, therefore, he takes a keen interest in the payment of clergymen. He said one evening at a Boston dinner party:

"There are still too many people like the old Highlander.

"A minister in a Highland parish found on reaching church one stormy Sunday morning that only one worshiper, an old Highlander, was present. The minister went up into the pulpit and he and the old fellow sung the opening hymn together. Then the minister prayed. Then he spread the manuscript of his sermon out on the lectern before him and looked at the Highlander and said:

"'Shall I give you the sermon in Gaelic or in English, Dugald?'

"'Gie it to us in baith,' said the old Highlander. 'Ye're well paid for't wi' yer ten pun a year.'"

Reclaim Barren Island

A barren island off the coast of Fukien, which has never produced a crop of any kind, is being reclaimed by a chemical treatment of the soil to overcome the acid condition, and already rice, potatoes and peanuts have been raised in an experimental way. The island is said to be capable of pasturing 5,000 head of cattle and recently several hundred sheep have been placed on it and soon it is expected the desolate land will bloom. Heretofore the island has been visited by several thousand peasants during the fishing season and these have been compelled to carry all their supplies. After the fishing is over the island is entirely deserted for the remainder of the year.

Border Patrol Officer Shot Near Roseau Tuesday

Robert Lobdell, St. Paul, a border patrol officer was shot and killed while on duty near Roseau late Tuesday evening. He is believed to have been killed by rum runners.

Lobdell, who was 30 years old, was shot at close range, the bullet entering the temple. His body was found by the editor of the Williams Northern Light at 10 p. m. Tuesday. There were no wittnesses to the killing.

George Ryan, a woodchopper, was taken in custody on Wednesday about 15 miles from the place where the shooting took place, when he approached a farm house at an early hour for a meal. When searched by the authorities his pockets bore markings of a gun and he failed to account for his being there. He was trailed all night thru snow by men from the Roseau and Lake of the Woods county sheriffs forces and, his tracks showed he was running most of the way.

Ryan, who was supposed to be a floater from New York, is believed by local people to be the suspicious looking fellow who stayed in town here over Sunday and who upon departing remarked to a local youth that he had looked the old burg over but did figure it for a good job.

The State Highway Department have made daily trips thru here this week with a large snow plow which has cleared up the road in fine shape.

The Girl Who Came Back

By Jack Woodford

Copyright W. N. U. Service

THE STORY

Influenced by loneliness, without relatives, or real friends, in Chicago, Lolita Forbes, young and pretty, yields to the importunities of Harvey Torrence, with whom she fancies herself in love. She discovers his true character and leaves him, taking refuge with an acquaintance, Gertrude Watson. Lolita is accosted by the son of the wealthy owner of the apartments, Fred Watterson. She repulses his advances, but he insists on driving her to the store. On the street Torrence is waiting. He puts the worst construction on Lolita's being with Watterson, and the two men engage in a fistic battle in which Torrence is killed. Lolita spends a night of misery in a police cell. She informs her father, by wire, of her situation, but he answers that he "never wants to see her face again." Next morning the judge, at the instigation of a lawyer, a stranger to Lolita, dismisses the case.

Amazed, Lolita examined the envelope which the note had come in. There was nothing upon it to indicate from whence it had come. There was no signature, nothing upon either paper or envelope to identify them by. She leaned back in the taxicab, spent, exhausted and put everything from her mind.

• • • • • • •

For more than a week Lolita did nothing but rest and attend to her worrying. After that, however, and nothing worse having happened to her, she began to think that perhaps, after all, she had paid the piper in full. Avidly she watched the papers daily with a sort of horrified fascination expecting each day to see a date set for the hanging of the Watterson boy; but, oddly enough, the whole case dropped from sight in a few days; everybody seemed to forget all about it, and the papers stopped saying anything at all about it. Watterson's father not only owned the Grantham, he owned a lot of other buildings beside.

Finally, one day, Lolita ventured out. She had dyed her reddish yellow hair a dark brown, and had bought a complete outfit of new clothes and, to make assurance doubly sure, a pair of horn-rimmed glasses, with neutral lenses in them, which changed her appearance so that she almost felt as though she were looking at a stranger when she looked into the glass. She had lost a good deal of pride in her good looks, and had come to feel that to be personable was more or less of a drawback. The first thing that she did, once downtown, was to call up Gertrude and make an appointment with her for lunch. They met in a tearoom where a good many stenographers and clerks took their lunch.

"My God!" Gertrude commented "you look like something that a blind cat dragged in; I hardly knew you at first. You're twenty pounds lighter, paler, and your hair!—why it takes all of the life out of you dyed that way. And you look kind of scared—sort of."

"Kind of scared, sort of, is very correct," said Lolita gravely. "I have been frightened out of seventeeen years' growth in the wrong direction. I shall never forgive myself."

"Oh, come out of it; be yourself. What is there for you to be forgiven for? My goodness, if nobody were ever forgiven a mistake, there wouldn't be anybody in Heaven at all, except God, and a few scraggly maiden aunts."

"But to think that I caused the death of—"

"Oh, don't think about it. You performed a service for humanity at large. He was long overdue dead. Don't you know that a few years ago a girl that he put on the bummer was found floating around near the Municipal pier one night? And God knows how many more they haven't found, after he got through with them."

"I know, that may be true, still—"

"Oh, you'll get over it, girlie."

"Where are you living now?"

Gertrude looked surprised at this question.

"Where am I living? Well, where do you suppose I'd be living? I'm at the Grantham, only I got a better room, and my rent is paid for life—in full. Watterson's old man told me to lay off the reporters and I wouldn't ever have to pay any more rent as long as I lived. I made him put it in writing."

Lolita looked disapprovingly at her, but Gertrude merely laughed and then added:

"Don't think the old man was so broken up, either. Say, that kid caused him more trouble than a harem full of five hundred wives could. He was glad of the necessity for packing him off to Europe."

"But Mrs. Watterson?"

"There isn't any Mrs. Watterson; they were divorced years ago and he's [illegible] for some moments they sat silently listening to the pianist's somewhat sketchy rendition of "Hearts and Flowers."

"Tell me," said Lolita, suddenly remembering; "did some man come and talk to you, while I was in the police station, asking you things about me, and—"

"Some man; Dear G—d, girl—it seems to me that every policeman, reporter and plain citizen in the whole city of Chicago did; I never talked so much in my life."

"But did one of them ask you about my 'ambitions?'"

"Oh yes," said Gertrude, suddenly remembering; she stopped to light a cigarette. "Yeh, there was that one guy who was different from the rest. I remember him awful well because he was the only one who believed what I said when I opened up and told him the truth; in fact, he was the only one that I did give the inside dope to. There was something about him, different, sad like. I bulled him along about how you was going to go to school and everything, when you got out of the mess, and he got right happy over that."

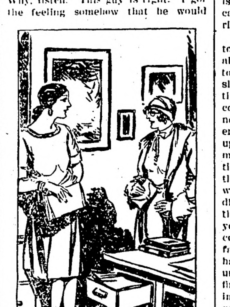
"Hot diggity dog!" was Gertrude's enthusiastic comment.

"Of course I can't accept it."

"Oh-h-h Lord! You make me sick. Why, listen. This guy is right. I got the feeling somehow that he would have been just as interested in you if you were a boy. He ain't the usual kind, take it from me. Why he's got the gravest, saddest, nicest eyes I ever saw in my life. Don't think for one instant that he's got 'intentions.' I don't see how you could possibly think anything like that after seeing him."



"Why Certainly I Mean That You Could."

"But I haven't seen him. He sent me an unsigned letter by a lawyer. I've seen nothing of him."

"Well, I'm here to tell you that if you don't do like he wants you to, you ought to be shot; why he—Good G—d!" Gertrude broke off and stared across the room, "there he is."

"There!" Gertrude pointed, forgetful of manners.

Lolita saw a kindly looking man of perhaps forty or forty-five, rising from a table. For a second his eyes, which were gray, rested upon hers, then he turned his back toward her, walked to the cashier's desk, paid his check and withdrew. She saw, as he put on his hat, that his hair was graying at the temples. Instantly she knew what Gertrude meant by saying that he had no 'intentions' (at least he could have none in the sense that Gertrude meant it) and, furthermore, she was conscious of a pleasing sense of familiarity; somehow she felt that she had seen him before, known him at some time or other, and yet, too, she was perfectly certain that she had not. It was one of those feelings that come to all of us at times, which lead us a little to believe that we have lived in some former life.

"Ain't he a nice old chap?" said Gertrude enthusiastically.

"I don't think he's so old," returned Lolita softly; "and he certainly is nice. I'm ashamed to have suspected him of ulterior motives—still, it does seem impossible to accept his aid without knowing exactly why it is given, doesn't it?"

"What seems impossible about it?" Gertrude asked in great puzzlement. Lolita sighed.

"You wouldn't understand, dear. Well, I expect it's about time for you to be getting back, isn't it?"

"G—d, yes!" commented Gertrude and rose hurriedly. She reached for her coat, but a young man got it first.

"May I help you on with it, my dear?" he said politely.

"Certainly," smiled Gertrude.

He helped her put on her coat.

"You wouldn't give a fellow your telephone number, would you?" he next asked.

"Certainly," said Gertrude, "it's Ardmore 6904."

"Thanks," he commented significantly as they walked off. Lolita noticed that he had paid no attention whatsoever to her. She remembered her glasses and congratulated herself that she had been able to put an end to the good looks that usually caused men to stop and turn upon the street to look at her—at least she was glad that she had put an end to them temporarily, a gladness which she would, perhaps, not have felt had they been permanently gone.

"Why do you give men your 'phone number so casually, Gertrude, dear?" Lolita said softly reproving; "I do so wish you'd change a little; you're such a darn good kid, down underneath."

"The trouble is, my dear," said Gertrude brightly, "that you're the only one who has ever troubled to look down underneath, so what's the use? And, besides, I didn't give him my telephone number, I gave him somebody's else's telephone number—God knows whose; and I hope whoever it is, they'll have him arrested when he calls up. It's the easiest way to get rid of birds like that." Lolita laughed.

When Gertrude had hurried off back to the store, Lolita walked slowly along, thinking. She had not intended to go near Southwestern university; she had intended to get another position and save her money so that she could repay the kind stranger; but now that she had seen him, she felt entirely different. She speculated upon the fact of how a person's face, molded and shaped by the accumulation of thoughts that they had been in the habit of having through the years, was almost invariably an outward indication of the person inside whom the world is not supposed to see and yet almost invariably knows. She unconsciously raised her hand to her face, terrified by the thought that perhaps it was beginning to be marked unmistakably by her inner self. She firmly resolved to see that the markings, hereafter, would be such as she would want the world to see; after all, there was no hiding anything unpleasant and unpretty. The man's eyes had been so kindly, and withal, so disappointed; for, had he not asked her to refrain from further association with Gertrude? How he must have felt upon noting that her only reaction to his kindness and help was a failure to observe a very slight wish that he had expressed. She resolved to at least please him by going to Southwestern university and talking with the registrar; it was the least that she could do.

At the registrar's office upstairs she was greeted by a lovely girl who looked very young, had wavy chestnut hair, hazel eyes, and a delightful manner of speaking correctly without seeming to make any effort to do so.

"Won't you sit down?" invited the girl pleasantly. Lolita sat down in the little office.

Briefly she related what her educational background had been.

"Well," the girl began slowly, when she had finished, "since you have nothing beyond high-school credits, you could hardly take the regular four years' credit course without a good deal of preliminary work; still," she leaned forward as though talking confidentially to an old friend, "I wouldn't worry about that, if I were you. If you were to attend school here, taking special courses, I think you would get everything you wanted out of it. I'm not the registrar; he's away today; I'm his secretary, but perhaps I can advise you. I often do help people select their courses. There are several things you might take up—" She turned and looked off out of the window a moment speculatively. "My dear," she went on turning back suddenly; "perhaps it is perfectly silly of me, but I have an idea that you could write. If you cared to take up a line of study consistent with that general subject you'd find it absorbing."

"Do you really mean that I could ever make my living as a short story writer?"

"Why, certainly, I mean that you could. A great many girls have taken the short-story class here and subsequently been able to support themselves, after a time, by their writings. You are, if you will pardon my saying so, the 'subjective' type; that is, you are mental (a misleading use of the term I know) as opposed to dynamic—or at least that is my thought, my reaction to you, I—"

Too Much Pessimism Takes Joy From Life

People that are always looking for all the hardships and difficulties that they may meet travel a hard road if their speech is in line with their thinking. I know farmers that start in with spring work and see their crops ruined by coming disaster, until it has been stored away. A snow and cold spell coming after the oats are in is certain to kill the seed, and all must be done over. A two days' rain is evidence that it is going to be so wet that nothing will mature. If the surface of the ground is dry we are in the start of a dry spell that will ruin everything. Thus it goes daily to the finish. I claim that a man that really thinks that way lives a mighty poor life. We have to take about everything on faith in this old world and on the whole our faith is justified. A happy philosophy of life is a thing that can be cultivated and is worth while. It is an added treasure to the joy of living, not for one but for many.—George Godfrey in Successful Farming.

Worshipers Bothered

Members of the congregation of the Scotch church in Georgetown, British Guiana, are compelled to use fans in church during the heated season, men as well as women being kept busy fanning. During the wet season the church was invaded by black beetles to such an extent that they put an end to the services until they were removed forcibly with brushes and shovels.

Drunken Horse Nets $15 Fine for Owner

New York.—Joseph Lichocky, fifty-five, was arraigned before Magistrate Harry Howard Dale recently on a charge of cruelty to animals. He was summoned to court by John P. Miller, agent of the S. P. C. A.

"In fact," Miller said, "I believe the horse was intoxicated."

Magistrate Dale asked Lichocky if this could be possible.

"Yes," replied Lichocky. "I may have given him a nip or two to brace him up."

Magistrate Dale imposed a $15 fine.

CONVICT DECLINES FREEDOM FROM CELL

Confined 45 Years, He Calls Prison Home.

Charleston, S. C.—Walls have not a prison made—but have made a home for Henry Scrivens, negro, now in his forty-fifth year of confinement at the state penitentiary.

Decrepit, partially paralyzed, the prisoner who began his life within the walls in 1885 for "burglary and larceny" fears more than any other one thing—freedom. He runs away from outsiders and when granted a parole in 1924, came back tearfully after three months, begging to be allowed "to come home again."

No one knows what Scrivens stole—Scrivens himself has forgotten in these later years, for his memory has failed—but some say it was an anchor from a boat. The prison record simply says:

"Henry Scrivens, No. 19,889, Charleston county. Burglary and larceny. Sentenced to life imprisonment by Judge Watts in 1885. Sentence suspended June 1, 1924, and voluntarily returned September 17, 1924."

It is the old negro's duty to keep the second floor of the prison infirmary clean. Prison officials say it is spotless. From the second floor of the infirmary to his cell tier is Scrivens' world. He will only venture into other corridors when ordered. He trembles and weeps when in any other part of the prison.

Scrivens has outlived all other prisoners who came here during the past century.

Nurse Kills 4 Tots and Ends Own Life

Minneapolis, Minn.—A nurse and four little boys were found dead from gas poisoning when the father of the children, Herbert Moreau, a steel worker, returned to his home here. The dead were Miss Violet Hultberg of Long Lake, Minn., and George, eight years old; Herbert, Jr., seven; Edward, five, and Robert, four. A verdict of murder and suicide was returned by a deputy coroner after he had read a note left by Miss Hultberg, who was nineteen. Miss Hultberg, in the note addressed to Moreau, asked him not to "feel angry for what I am doing."

Moreau recently obtained a divorce from his wife and said Miss Hultberg was in love with him, but that her parents objected to a marriage with him.

Letter Is Returned After 15 Years' Travel

Pasadena, Calif.—After 15 years of travel between here and Colombia, South America, a letter has been returned to the sender.

In December, 1913, F. Posthuma of Pasadena sent a letter seeking employment to a mining company in South America. The assortment of stamped directions on the envelope indicated the Colombian post office authorities made little effort to deliver it until February, 1920. Then attempts to find the addresses were without success and the letter was started back toward Pasadena.

For the last eight years it has been wandering in that general direction.

Greek Counterfeiters Fake American Money

Athens, Greece.—A number of counterfeiters arrested recently were discovered to be making American money. Having no special American bank note paper, the counterfeiters bought American paper dollars, removed the printing by a chemical process, and reprinted the blank paper, thus obtaining denominations of higher value. Nine new warrants have been issued for the arrest of other members of the band. The Cyprus police telegraph that they discovered counterfeit Cyprian money, while the police of Trieste confiscated counterfeit Egyptian pounds, all believed to be the work of the same gang.

A petrified ham, thought to be at least one thousand years old, was found in an old rock fence near Danville, Ky. Persons who have examined it declare that the rock was undoubtedly a fine ham at one time. It has the exact shape and size of a ham which would weigh about 15 pounds. In its petrified state it weighs 25 pounds.—Indianapolis News.

Good Bye, 1928

by William L. Gaston

GOODBYE, 1928; goodbye. You have been a great year, but you will have to go. A husky youngster is ready to sweep across the border line of time and you will have to move on. You did well, Old Year. You brought a golden harvest; you widened the markets of the world; you fattened our flocks; your mills ground the grist of plenty, and peace and prosperity have been weaving at the loom.

You came with sunshine and rain; you brought us much of joy and some of sorrow. Your days were fair, but your nights dragged in some little of gloom and disaster—something of storm, of flood—and planted night shades in the garden of roses. But you have been a good year.

During your fateful hours our knights of the air have threaded the paths of the clouds from new world to old world and brought the continents together with but little of intervening sea. They gave to man the triple dominion of land and water and air. But the banners of glory were bordered in black—intrepid spirits fell from the clouds into the sea.

Pass on—take with you the grief and pain you brought. Bury your dead and drag off the wrecks by the roadside. We forgive your faults and remember only your benedictions.

Now, hail to the chief—the last born of time. The crown and throne of the centuries are yours. Put on the armour of ages and with glittering sword and shield of gold, beat back for us the evil hours. You have come to a better world than any other year has ever known. We greet you with the wealth and genius of all your predecessors. The plows are in the fields; great ships are sailing the deep; millions of motors are gliding to and fro over the earth; airplanes are haunting the skies; the lightnings of heaven are turning wheels and serving men. Turn the magic page and write the story of things to be. Hail, 1929; it's your time!

His Old New Year's Resolution

By Martha Banning Thomas

MR. EASY-GO was preparing for bed on New Year's night. He had enjoyed the usual day with many calls upon friends, jolly greetings and some small remembrances which did not excite him any, because he expected them, and got them every year. There's nothing especially thrilling in such a program, pleasant as it sounds.

"Oh—hum!" he yawned; "thus the world wags. I wish something different would pop up."

Something different did pop up, but nothing like what he was looking for. There came a knock on the door, and following the knock somebody entered. It was such a strange somebody that he could not possibly be described.

"Great Caesar!" exclaimed Mr. Easy-Go, jumping up from his chair, "who are you?"

"Don't you recognize me?" quavered an old voice with a crack in it. "You've known me for twenty years. It's a funny thing if you can't tell who I am."

Mr. Easy-Go regarded his visitor in some alarm. He was twisted and thin and gnarled and weather-beaten; he had no particular shape or features.

"I have been your most intimate friend for a long time," continued the cracked old voice; "I did not always look like this; I was once young and straight and full of vim. You starved me!"

"Good heavens, man, I never saw you before! How could I starve you?"

"I have lived with you twenty years. I know you better than your best friend. I am your Old-New-Year's Resolution!"

Mr. Easy-Go dropped his jaw. Things looked serious. "Please explain," he begged in a shaken voice.

"Twenty years ago you made me, and for twenty years you have broken me and forgotten me and starved me. I cannot survive another twelve months, so I have come to warn you: I shall be dead, and part of you will be dead unless you revive me this year. Take warning!"

Mr. Easy-Go sat staring a long time into his fire. "He's right," he said slowly, "that dear old Resolution. By George! I'll keep him this year or die in the attempt! Perhaps he'll grow young and vigorous again."

With that he got into bed.

Next morning Mr. Easy-Go started in on his Old-New-Year's-Resolution, and made a New-New-Year's-Resolution not to forget it for a day—and what's more, he accomplished it!

Their New Year

By Blanche Tanner Dillin

PLEADING weariness after her journey that day, Helen Martin left the merry New Year's eve revelers. Throwing a wrap around her, she stepped out on the hotel veranda, into the crisp, clear, mountain air. How refreshing it was, and how beautiful the moonlight on the snow!

Just such a night three years ago she had given a party, and the man she loved, a young navy officer, had taken his few hours' leave to come and tell her good-by."

"For three years, Helen," he said at parting, and she, hoping for more, but too proud to let him even guess the fact, had answered what was meant to be a question.

The years filled with longings for what never came, were lonely and empty, in spite of the success of the now famous "movie" star, "Helen Martyne." It was the fear of the lonely years ahead that delayed her signing a contract now awaiting her; she had hoped up here away from the turmoil of the city that she could come to some decision about accepting the contract, but she seemed no nearer one than before. With a sigh she turned back to the hotel.

As she entered two men standing with their backs toward her were telling of the forced landing of an airplane of which they were passengers that day. Something about "delays" and "short leave" caught Helen's attention. A low cry escaped her as she heard one man addressed as "Lieutenant Brainard." She turned quickly to leave, but he had seen her and was at her side.

"Where can we go?" he whispered, and she led him to a secluded nook she had discovered. It was there the revelers' welcome to the "New Year" reached them.

"Happy New Year, darling," he whispered with a kiss.

Doubts and misunderstandings were swept away, and just ahead were home and love and happiness and no more contracts to be considered.

Watching the New Year In

Nearly everyone wishes to begin the year right by watching the old year out and the new one in and a watch party will strike the right note as it will adapt itself to the needs of a small or a large party.

THE DEALERS IN PEARLS

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

A BEAUTIFUL wooded section on the lower Illinois river. Clear to the water's edge grew the weeping willows, their branches drooped to kiss the purling ripples below. The chatter of red squirrels mingled with the melodies of song birds and the stridulating drone of winged insects. A muskrat swimming from the shore to a small island, a turtle sunning itself on a log and the occasional splash of a finny denizen. Infinite peace and contentment.

Old Joe Henderson had regarded the scene with complacent enjoyment, but now a frown of apprehension spread over his rugged face as he stood erect toward the west bank. A motor boat had pulled up to the landing before a small white cottage that was all but hid in a willow grove.

"It's that pesky Sam Danks again," muttered Joe, "the crookedest pearl buyer that ever skinned an honest clam fisherman. What's he going up there to pester Mary for? She ain't got no pearls to sell."

But Joe was only partially correct, for Mary did have a pearl to sell. Joe took a very personal interest in the welfare of Mary Birkens, a comely middle-aged widow who dwelt alone in the small cottage.

"Wherever Sam Danks goes there's trouble to follow," proclaimed Joe. "I'm just going to sneak up there and see that he don't make some kind of trouble for Mary."

He had been dragging the river bed for clams with a crowfoot grapple. Now he hastily pulled this contrivance over the gunwhales and with lusty strokes rowed for a point about fifty yards below the white cottage.

A few minutes later he stood beneath an open kitchen window effectually concealed by a huge rosebush. Very cautiously he peered over the sill. Sam Danks was expertly appraising a beautiful pearl that lay in the palm of his hand. Fully fifty grains in weight, pear-shaped and bluish black in color. A most lustrous gem of irridescent sheen.

"I've been saving it for years," Mary was saying. "And all the river men tell me it's easy worth $200."

"Not by itself," answered Danks. "Now if you only had a mate to it to make a matched pair of eardrops I'd give you $500 for the pair. But alone what good is it? Just fit for a lavalier or a pendant. I'll give you an even hundred for it, that's the best I can do."

"No, I must have $200," insisted Mary. "I've got to roof and repair this house before winter and that's the figure the carpenters have named. So it's $200 or nothing."

For ten minutes they dickered and wrangled but to no avail. Mary persisted in her price and all Dank's wiles proved futile. Finally he prepared to leave.

"I'm going to stop at the boat livery for gas," he stated, "then I'm going over to Greer's island to see what the shanty boaters over there have got in my line. Better think over my offer. I'll stop in again on my way back."

When Danks arrived at the island Joe Henderson was already there waiting for him. The old river man was sitting in an armchair on the sunny porch of his trim little houseboat which was moored first in a long line of similar craft.

"Hello there, old timer," shouted Danks as he approached the island and shut off his motor. "Got anything in my line today?"

"Maybe," answered Joe.

Joe drew a small pill box from his pocket and removed the cover. There in a soft bed of cotton lay a beautiful pearl. Fully fifty grains in weight, pear-shaped and bluish-black in color. A most lustrous gem of irridescent sheen.

Dank's eyes glittered as he examined it. An undisputed pearl expert, he recognized it at once as a perfect mate for the pearl Mary had shown him. An expression of avarice spread over his face. He would hold out on his firm, buy the two pearls himself and have them mounted, thereby reaping all the profit.

But Joe Henderson seemed reluctant to sell, and Danks spent a half-hour in persuasive argument. Finally Joe consented to sell, but demanded a stiff price. After considerably more dickering they settled upon the sum of $200 and the gem changed hands.

"Say," blustered Dank, "seeing as how you need the money and me liking you personally maybe I can do a little better than a hundred on that pearl you showed—"

"Oh, you're too late," responded Mary. "Just a few seconds after you left Joe Henderson came in and gave me two hundred for it."

"What!" shouted Danks. "Say—say, I think you're a couple of crooks, and—"

"Hold on, three. Don't get insulting."

It was a deep masculine voice. A sturdily built young man stepped from behind a grape arbor and confronted the dazed pearl buyer. It was the game warden, who patroled that section of the river.

"Oh, you're in on this, too," sneered Danks.

"Never mind that," answered the warden. "I stood on the bank and watched Joe sell you that pearl. He bought it a few minutes before from Mary, and he didn't tell you where he got it. In fact, you didn't ask. Now, Sam Danks, you just make yourself scarce around here. I've been watching you, and I don't like your way of doing business. Always robbing the clam fishermen—"

As the afternoon was waning Joe rowed over from the island and joined Mary in the garden. He procured a hoe and helped the widow with her weeding. Soon the patch was finished and Mary invited Joe to stay for supper.

After an ample and happy repast they repaired to the cozy parlor, where an old-fashioned oil lamp lent its rather feeble brilliance to the proceedings. Following an interval of casual conversation, Joe finally ventured:

"Mary, I'm fifty-five years old and you're forty-seven."

"Yes," she replied.

Suffice to say, Joe asked Mary to become his wife, and the good lady acquiesced.

"Mary," said Joe tenderly, "I know that you have no money, and that you have a hard time keeping this little house up. And it makes me feel good to know that you accepted me thinking that I was just a penniless old river rat."

"The truth is," continued Joe "that as long as I've been on the river I've never sold a single pearl of my own. I've dragged up hundreds of tons of clams in the last twenty years, and sold the shells to the button factories. That, with my trapping, fishing and herb gathering, has furnished me a good living."

"But you surely must have found some pearls in all those clams," said Mary.

He drew from his pocket a small leather case, opened it and displayed to her astonished gaze a most amazing collection of fresh-water pearls, slugs, eardrops and seed pearls.

"Didn't just know what I was saving them for," Joe said, "but now I know. For you and me for later on—to take care of us in our old age."

First American City to Have Town Clock

The first American town clock was set up in the steeple of a church in Guilford, Conn., something like two centuries ago. Made almost entirely of wood, it was built by a Yankee mechanical genius, Ebenezer Parmelee. This is the story of how it came about that Guilford was the first town in the United States to own a town clock.

The village was founded by Rev. Henry Whitfield in the autumn of 1639. He was a clergyman in the Church of England and came to this country for greater religious liberty. He had not been here long before the first church was founded.

The members of his flock met with him at his home, which is now the State Historical museum. In 1643 the first church building was erected, on Guilford green, and stood until early in 1700, when a new edifice was put up to replace the old building torn down.

Just as soon as the new church was finished members of the congregation began to make plans for a bell. The bell was secured, but then a steeple had to be built to put it in.

In 1706 the steeple was completed, but the church tower looked lonely to the townspeople without a clock. There was no such thing as a town clock in the colonies. Ebenezer Parmelee was the mechanical genius of Guilford and the church officer called upon him to see what he could do in the clock line.

After considerable experiment, Parmelee turned out the clock which has since borne his name and which made him famous in the colony. It is a big, cumbersome affair, made entirely of wood. It was wound by means of a large crank, which the sexton of the church had to operate every Monday morning. Dials were placed on four sides of the steeple.

Whenever the clock got out of order Parmelee was called upon by the church committee to repair it. After some years of labor of this kind, his services as clock tinker were rewarded by the citizens of Guilford, who voted, December 15, 1741, to free him from service in town offices so long as he continued to keep the clock ticking. The old clock did service until a new one replaced it in 1830.

Amid the cobwebs and the owls it was left neglected and forgotten for years. Then some one asked what had become of the old timepiece, and searching parties found it, covered with the dust of a century, in the church tower. With it were the weights, composed of barrels of stone, that had been used for years to run it.

Not so many years ago it was voted at a church meeting to lend the clock to the local historical society, and it took its final journey to the Whitfield house, now a museum.—Washington Star.

Woman's Dangerous Age

The Salvation Army, completing a survey of "moral hazards confronting women in industry" is led to the conclusion that eighteen is the dangerous age for women and that "women cooks possibly have the highest moral standing." Home girls, school girls and domestic servants were lowest on the list.

Hold Ostrich Plumes for Return to Favor

If feathers ever come back into favor many a poor man will make a fortune. There are still many ostrich feathers in storage at customs warehouses in Britain. The plumes were left on their owners' hands when the fashion changed.

Some of them would have been extremely valuable 20 years ago. Now they can be used only in making cushions or dusters, while a few of the smaller feathers are sold each year to dressmakers for the costumes of debutantes who are to be presented at court.

The fact that synthetic feathers are now being made causes the value of the real ones to depreciate still more. Yet a number of dealers believe that feathers will come back soon, and are determined to keep the rarer plumes till they do.—London Answers.

His Fiddles Unusual

Ethan Dix of McMinnville, Ore., who makes violins from cow horns, gourds or anything else, that will hold a string, believes that he has a unique collection of fiddles.

One fiddle is carved from a gourd, another is made from the horn of a Texas steer, and one in the form of a dollar sign. One fiddle in the collection was run over during the Civil war by an ammunition wagon. A violin maker glued the pieces together, and Mr. Dix regards its music as unusual.—Spokane Spokesman-Review.

Photographs of Mars

Much valuable work has been done with the great Lick refractor in planetary observations. At the last close approach of Mars 32 drawings of the planet and about 1,500 photographs were obtained, many of these with the aid of specially dyed plates, says Nature Magazine. These are of great value in interpreting the nature of the changes that are continually taking place on the surface of the planet.

Gold Put to Various Uses by East Indians

Most people have a fondness for gold either as coin or as a precious ornament. The natives of India have some other uses for gold which are quite extraordinary. In certain cases of illness they swallow it as medicine in the form of thin leaf. A pious Indian frequently shows his devotion by regilding the domes of religious buildings, an act of piety which may easily cost him upwards of $50,000. Gold sovereigns with a shield on the obverse side are much prized by the natives. A rajah who had collected a large number of such coins used them to form a center to each pane in the windows of his palace. Unlike other countries, where the people's savings are used to promote trade, those of India are hoarded and buried.

Confident

During the vacation period, two elderly men were sitting near one of the bathing beaches in northern Indiana.

"I haven't been in the water for twenty years, but I believe I could swim today just as well as I could then," said Mr. R.

"Oh, come now," replied his friend. "You're spry enough but its absurd to say that you could go in the lake and swim as well as you could in the old days."

"I feel confident I could," persisted the white-haired veteran. "I couldn't swim at all then and I guess I could do that well now."

Runs Phone for 25 Subscribers

Aged Nebraska Man Provides Service to Farmers at $15 a Year.

Paige, Neb.—What is believed to be the smallest independent telephone exchange in the United States, and also the most oddly operated, is some twenty miles from here right in the heart of the hay and ranch lands of the northwestern part of the state.

The exchange was built and is now owned and operated by "Santa Claus" Elijah Luther Clark, seventy-one. He carries the monicker of Santa Claus on account of his many kindly deeds, his age, long white beard, and his "trouble shooting" wagon with which he can be seen almost any day working along his telephone line.

The exchange, which is called the North Pole exchange, has nearly 100 miles of telephone line and 52 subscribers. Clark has put a limit of 52 on his subscription list because if he took on any more he would have to enlarge his entire system, and the expense, he says, would be prohibitive.

Only Communication.

The system is the only means available for the residents of the district either to communicate with each other or with the outside country. Through Clark's exchange his subscribers can talk to New York, Chicago, or San Francisco, and get the same good service that they would receive if they talked from any exchange in any big city.

When there is a death in a subscriber's household Clark gives them a year's subscription to his telephone service free of charge. If a subscriber has had bad crops or any other kind of hard luck, Santa Claus cuts his telephone bill in proportion to the bad luck. And not once has he sued a customer for a bill.

"If they don't pay me they must need the money worse than I do," he says and takes his tough luck with a smile. However, when a customer fails to pay his bill, Clark sends him a notice advising him that if the bill is not paid in two years the telephone service will be discontinued.

True, a few of them skip out without paying, but his losses on accounts is surprisingly low.

His wires are strung along fence posts, trees, and regular telephone poles. Although seventy-one, he climbs the poles with the agility of a youngster and no weather is too severe for him to venture out to repair his lines.

Aiding the old gentleman in the operation of his exchange, are his two daughters, who are the "hello girls," and his wife, who takes an occasional turn as "hello girl" but does most of her telephone work with "pa." In fact, she knows about as much about the system as he does and he often goes to her for advice.

Clark's trouble shooting wagon is a sort of a camp wagon affair and is drawn by two white horses—not quite so old as their owner.

Started 15 Years Ago.

Mr. Clark started the exchange 15 years ago. Having a natural instinct for things electric, he got the idea that it would be a great opportunity for his neighbors to have a telephone system.

He purchased a dozen second-hand telephones, 1,000 pounds of telephone wire and some other equipment. He had a hard time convincing the natives that his plan was feasible, but after agreeing to give a month's service free, he got 12 ranchers to allow the telephones to be installed.

It was a great day for the countryside when the telephone service was officially opened. Folks came for miles around expecting to laugh and have a good time at the expense of the foolish old man. But instead they were amazed when they learned they could really talk to other neighbors. For days and nights the 12 subscribers and their friends all tried to talk over the phones at the same time with the result that no one could understand what the others were saying.

Clark rearranged the service, putting only four and five customers on a line, and it was not long before he had his quota filled.

He charges $15 a year for the service. A year ago one of his subscribers talked to New York four times in two months and another talked to Chicago on several occasions.

Shaded Stockings Shunned in Paris

Paris.—Parisian women apparently have decided to have nothing to do with shaded stockings—the kind that are unevenly dyed so that the front may be light and the back a deeper shade, or the ankle a pale pink and the calf and knee a blush rose.

The same women have turned their backs on fishnet hosiery and hand-painted or hand-embroidered silk stockings. Most of the stockings worn here are in deep beige shades for day costumes and flesh or sunburn tints for evening.

Little Heirs to Many Millions

Girl Prefers Cell to Old Headgear

Oakland, Calif.—Jail is one thing and a new hat is another, so when pretty Patience Hunt of Oakland had her choice she picked the hat.

Miss Hunt was fined $15 when she appeared before Police Judge J. V. Gaffey of Burlingame on a speeding charge. He gave her the alternative of spending five days in jail.

"Fifteen dollars will buy a new hat," she told the judge. "I will deposit the money so I can go home and straighten up my affairs and then I'll come back to go to jail."

She kept her word to the letter and went to jail.

STUDENTS SELL BLOOD TO PAY FOR THEIR TUITION

Two or Three Transfusions During Academic Year Meets Cost of Semester Fees.

Confronted with this question, Dr. William H. McCastline, Columbia university's medical officer, answered in the affirmative. The average student of normal health can safely undergo two or three transfusions during the academic year, the university medical authority announced, thus earning $150, the cost of a semester's tuition.

Doctor McCastline is attempting to insist, however, that all the university's student blood donors be given a thorough physical and mental examination to determine their fitness for it.

What Doctor McCastline admits to be the [illegible] serious problem of this nature [illegible] arise at Columbia had its start only recently when a hospital inserted an advertisement for blood donors in Spectator, the campus daily newspaper, and which 150 men and women students answered by calling at the laboratories for blood tests. The students were out to help pay their semester expenses with the $50 price for one transfusion, and incidentally to help save the lives of hospital patients.

The Spectator advertisement has developed an "unhealthy interest" in blood giving among the students, Doctor McCastline said, adding that he would not allow any further advertisements for blood donors to appear in the university daily.

To meet this "unhealthy interest" in transfusions Doctor McCastline announced he had inaugurated a system of registering prospective student blood donors in the university medical office. By this means he hopes to determine the fitness, both mentally and physically, of the individual student before he offers his blood. Several of the 150 who have or intend to offer themselves for transfusions have already registered at Doctor McCastline's office.

French Girls Said to Be Most Graceful Walkers

Paris.—French girls are the world's most graceful walkers, according to the judgment of the audience at a Paris theater where an international walking contest has been staged. American, British, German, and other show girls entered were not placed. M. Mariot, promoter of the contest, declared the secret of the French girl's walk was that she doesn't walk—she glides!

FAMOUS EATING PLACE IS CLOSED

Shanghai Mourns Passing of "Jimmy's Kitchen."

Shanghai.—Shanghai's midnight sons and daughters, devotees of the cabaret and dance halls, are mourning the passing of the city's most famous night life institution, "Jimmy's Kitchen."

There was no pomp or ceremony, no orchestral din or garish display about "Jimmy's." It was just a roughly equipped restaurant in the heart of a district where Magdalenes of many nationalities are quartered.

"Jimmy's" was owned by one Joseph James, a young American who served in the American army and was stationed at Tientsin. Fame came to "Jimmy's" almost overnight.

Three years ago the place was virtually unknown, save to a few soldiers and sailors. One night a prominent American, attracted by a sign reading "American ham and eggs," dined at "Jimmy's." He was astounded at the excellence of food and coffee.

Proudly young James informed him that practically all of his food was imported from America. The word spread quickly. Americans and Britons in large numbers flocked to the place.

Within a short time it became the fashionable gathering place of Shanghai in the small hours of the morning. The customers made many suggestions to James, but the latter would not change his equipment. He stuck to the rough board tables, the thick mugs and the thicker glasses. He steadfastly refused to supply other than paper napkins.

"Jimmy's" sold no liquor and none was permitted on the premises. A husky "bouncer" was constantly on duty to stop fights between seafaring men who patronized the place.

And night after night it was a common sight to see sailors in and out of uniforms, soldiers, marines, merchant marine sailors, beachcombers, dancing girls, clerks, Chinese, and men and women in evening clothes seated at the tables in "Jimmy's."

The once familiar sign "Jimmy's Kitchen," is gone now. The owner has gone into the cabaret business and has disposed of the famous restaurant.

New "Engine Trouble" Is Blamed on Stork

Anchorage, Alaska.—Something new in the way of an "alibi" to explain the lateness of a scheduled train comes from the operating department of the Kugorok railroad, out of Nome.

In connection with the official report, it should be explained that the Kugorok railway system is the only one known which relies on dogs for motive power.

In this instance a distemper epidemic all but wiped out the "engines" on No. 1, the fast mail, leaving only a vixen to put through the mail to the north. On arrival at the terminal the "engine" was visited by the stork, necessitating substitution of a new and untrained lead dog.

All went well until the half-way point where trains No. 1 and No. 2 pass at a siding. Here the new lead slipped his leash and gave chase to a rabbit, causing a delay of several hours.

As a climax, the reserves in the doghouse got into a fight and chewed each other so badly that an entire new complement was necessary.

This was the hard luck story related to the superintendent by the head engineer when called to the carpet to tell why the train was many hours late.

Old Seafarer's Relics Given to Yale Museum

New Haven, Conn.—Logbooks and paintings of craft which Capt. William Clift of Mystic, Conn., had sailed as master have been given to Peabody museum at Yale university as relics of early maritime history of the New England coast.

Captain Clift died in 1862, fifth in line from the first Clift who came from England to Scituate, Mass. All sons in those generations were seafarers. Captain Clift himself had several hobbies. He always sailed on "shares," never failed to make his vessel pay a dividend and never permitted sailor, officer or passenger aboard to swear, play cards or drink.

Belgrade High School Girls Must Wear Black

He designated a uniform consisting of an ordinary black dress with a small beret cap. School officials are required to examine clothing, lips and cheeks carefully.

SPY AND SOLDIER WEDDED 64 YEARS

Both Over 90, but Still Hale and Hearty.

Kansas City, Mo.—Sixty-five years ago a young Confederate courier from Missouri and a Confederate "petticoat runner" from Mississippi met near Memphis. They never parted, and recently celebrated the sixty-fourth anniversary of their marriage here at their home.

Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Victor both are more than ninety. Their romance began after the Confederate evacuation of Corinth, Miss. Young Bill Victor, whose home was at Shelbyville, Mo., was detailed to scouting duty with a detachment having headquarters in Memphis.

Meet Petticoat Runner.

One afternoon he was scouting on a Union movement near the Tennessee-Mississippi line. He met a southern party, in which was Miss Mary Mitchell. The party had been to Memphis and was returning to the Mitchell plantation across the line in Mississippi. Young Victor saw Mary—and offered to escort the party to the plantation.

"I'd never paid any attention to soldiers until I met Bill," Mrs. Victor said. "I'd been busy fighting Yankees. But I did pay so much attention to him that we were married within a year at Memphis."

Both Mr. and Mrs. Victor are in excellent health. They are interested in politics and the scientific developments of the day.

"Why, bedtime used to be about 8:30 o'clock when I was a boy," he said. "But since the radio came in I never go to bed until the last one signs off."

Made Good Spies.

Mr. Victor has not been in Shelbyville since he left home at the age of seventeen to join the Army of the South. He was under Gen. Sterling Price when the Confederates besieged Lexington, Mo., and forced the Union leader, Colonel Mulligan, to surrender.

His regiment's first engagement, however, was in the bed of the Des Moines river, "somewhere along the Iowa-Missouri line."

"We were slipping up on a Federal force, and, as it turned out, the Federals were slipping up on us," he explains. "We met in the dead of the night in the middle of the river and both sides went back to their own side of the river."

Mrs. Victor's services to the Confederate cause consisted chiefly of watching Federal troop movements along the Tennessee-Mississippi border and giving Confederates sufficient warning to flee to safety.

"We petticoat runners," she said, "were the best spies because the Yankees were not afraid of us."

State Registers Babies by Numbers and Names

Topeka, Kan.—This state encourages parents to know their children by numbers as well as by names.

It reserves the right, however, to assign the numbers to new born babies. When the bureau of vital statistics in the state board of health records a birth certificate, it informs the child's parents under what registration number the document is filed, and suggests that the figure be remembered by the family.

This is a new policy inaugurated by Dr. Earle G. Brown, secretary of the board. Doctor Brown points out that the registry number may be helpful in later years if the certificate must be located immediately in the state archives.

Musician Calls Jazz a Fountain of Youth

Berlin.—Jack Hylton of London, known as the "jazz king of Europe," has discovered the secret of eternal youth. Arriving in Berlin with his jazz orchestra for an extended stay, he said:

"There is nothing that keeps a fellow so eternally young as playing in a jazz band. Jazz is an expression of youth, of joy, of bubbling enthusiasm. Anybody who plays it cannot help but keep young.

"More than that, our men can for the most part play six, seven, or eight instruments. All sorts of different muscles of the body are invoked in the process of playing them, so that a man keeps in good athletic training if he joins a jazz band."

Eat Oysters and Grow, New Zealander Advises

London.—The months with "R's" in them are good months to grow in, if the results of experiments by Dr. John Malcolm, New Zealand physiologist, reported to Nature, hold good generally.

Doctor Malcolm has found, by test feeding of rats, that oysters are a good source of vitamine A which promotes normal growth.

A native New Zealand bivalve, known as the Toheroa, is even better than the oyster, the experiments indicate. A Toheroa canning industry is growing up, the product being sold as "Toheroa soup."

Voice Low in Power

New York.—The power of human speech has been measured electrically by Dr. Harvey Fletcher of Bell telephone laboratories. He finds that if 5,000,000 persons all talked at once, in ordinary tones, the sound power thus created would be just sufficient to light an ordinary incandescent lamp.

PUEBLO SQUAW IS ABSOLUTE MASTER

Cave Man in Second Place in Home.

New York.—The cave man myth has been exploded.

He has only a secondary position in his own home, a visitor to the home of the Pueblo Indian cave men in Santa Clara, N. M., found. And the spouse rules the home as well as his worldly goods.

Seeking out the homes of the original cave men of the United States, far away from the cities where now and then a so-called "cave man" makes his appearance much to the awe of a large following, Andrew S. Wing visited one of the twenty Pueblo villages remaining in Arizona and New Mexico, delved into their family customs and their history. He found them still loyal to the Catholic faith, maintaining a family life exceptionally free from friction and rearing children who are obedient and of the best behavior.

"The Pueblo woman is the absolute master of her home," Wing asserts. "There is no individual land ownership, but each man is alloted a piece of land which he can cultivate as long as he works at it industriously. When the crops are harvested and stored in the house they become the property of the wife. Most Pueblo marriages are successful and their family life is congenial. All observers comment on the obedience and good behavior of the Pueblo children."

In one great communal cliff house explored by the writer 1,600 rooms were discovered.

Woman, 85, Sold Papers 50 Years on Same Spot

Berlin.—Frau Pauline Bath, aged eighty-five, is the first and oldest newspaper seller of Berlin. She recently celebrated her golden jubilee in her little stall in the busy city street known as Alt Moabit, where she has sat for 12 hours every day since October, 1878. Her reminiscences are mainly concerned with the growth of the city's street traffic.

The only thing that disturbs her contented mind is the increasing competition of other newspaper sellers in the neighborhood. "I have never asked for any public assistance in my life," she says. "All I hope is that the police won't allow any more news stands near my own."

Irish Army Dwindles From 50,000 to 5,000

Dublin.—Four years ago the Free State army numbered 50,000. Gradual reductions have brought the figure down to 9,000, and this process will continue until the number is 5,000, all highly trained and equipped.

This force will form the nucleus of a large army, which can be made available if required. There will be a strong reserve and a new volunteer force is being created with periods of annual training.

It is planned to establish an efficient college for the training of officers, and the experience gained in the United States by the officers who recently returned from study there is expected to prove very valuable.

Americans to Displace Chinese on U. S. Ships

Seattle.—Americans have changed places with the Chinese members of crews on steamships of the American Mail Line and the Dollar Steamship company, beginning recently. The move is in accordance with the provisions of the new mail contracts which provide that two-thirds of the employees of each ship, including officers, shall be citizens of the United States.

Each of the present type ship has been carrying 123 Chinese in its crew. This number will be replaced by American boys and men.

Hav "Whoopee" Hour for College Youths

Every Saturday evening a local vaudeville and movie theater sets aside in its evening performance a "whoopee" hour for the exclusive use of Cornell students.

During this hour all the hissing, booing, groaning, deriding, razzing and advising of actors, previously under ban by the theater's strong-arm squad, will be permitted.

The Girl Who Came Back

BY JACK WOODFORD

THE STORY

Influenced by loneliness, without relatives, or real friends, in Chicago, Lolita Forbes, young and pretty, yields to the importunities of Harvey Torrence, with whom she fancies herself in love. She discovers his true character and leaves him, taking refuge with an acquaintance, Gertrude Watson. Lolita is accosted by the son of the wealthy owner of the apartments, Fred Watterson. She repulses his advances, but he insists on driving her to the store. On the street Torrence is waiting. He puts the worst construction on Lolita's being with Watterson, and the two men engage in a fistic battle in which Torrence is killed. Lolita spends a night of misery in a police cell. She informs her father, by wire, of her situation, but he answers that he "never wants to see her face again." Next morning the judge, at the instigation of a lawyer, a stranger to Lolita, dismisses the case. The lawyer gives her $200 and an unsigned note informing her that college tuition has been paid for a year. He refuses to give the name of her benefactor. She takes up short story writing.

"You're not fooling me?" cut in Lolita, so intrigued with the thought of becoming a writer that she could scarce refrain from hugging the girl. "You really think that I have latent ability that I could ever—"

"My dear girl, I know you could; and then, too, so much depends upon one's determination to succeed. If you had that, in addition to what, apparently, seems to be a slight trace of the subjective, temperamental attributes of the writing type."

"Nothing in all the wide, wide world would please me so much," declared Lolita enthusiastically. "Oh! I'd try awfully hard."

"I know you would," encouraged the other, "I felt—"

Just then there was an interruption.

"Pardon me," said a pleasant voice from the doorway, "for intruding; but I won't be a moment. I just want to get my list of new registrants, I left it upon the desk top." He entered and reached for the list and turned to go, when the registrar's secretary stopped him.

"Mr. Warrill, I want you to meet Miss Farrar. Miss Farrar is thinking of taking up the short story. Miss Farrar, this is Mr. Warrill, our instructor of short story. He is himself a writer of short stories, as you probably have noticed, if you read the magazines."

Lolita stood up. A pair of deep brown eyes met hers. She felt her hand taken in a warm handclasp. She looked up at a grave, sympathetic, understanding face, looked, for a moment, above the face, at a neatly clipped head of dark hair flecked with premature gray hairs. She heard the delightful voice saying reassuring things to her; but she did not know what the things were. It was as though she had suddenly been struck by lightning and was numb. She hardly knew what she had said, how she had gotten downstairs and out into the rattle and bang of the street. She knew that she had arranged to report for study in the short-story class; and, as she walked meditatively toward the "L" station, she also knew one other thing; that she could handle understandingly, at least, one story theme; even if it were an old theme. She could write a story about a girl who had never believed that such a thing existed, falling madly in love at first sight.

CHAPTER IV

One afternoon, hardly more than two months after her enrollment, she approached the worn stone steps of the university building with intrepid footsteps and a bulky bundle of papers under her arm. Her heart beat like mad as the elevator jerked and staggered toward the fourth floor, in charge of a dental student in a white coat who was helping to pay his way through school by running the elevator. She walked toward the classroom, through the school library, smiling in at Miss Marion, in the registrar's office, as she passed it and getting a heartening smile in return which somewhat encouraged her; but her courage left her again as she entered the little room where the short-story class, limited to thirty students, met. Most of the class was there, sitting around the long table waiting for Mr. Warrill to come in. It was gloomy and dull within the room and Lolita felt depressed as she took a seat at the long table. Somehow the heart went completely out of her. In all of the time that she had been in the class so far, Mr. Warrill had only spoken to her once after acknowledging his introduction to her, and upon the second occasion he had merely reminded her that she had not yet turned in any kind of written assignment. Tonight the others were not animatedly chattering as usual; every one seemed tired and dull.

Lolita got to thinking of her father, the only relative she had, that she knew of, who still remained alive; remembered that she had practically no friends since the ghastly thing that had happened to her. She longed to go home to Elgin for a night or so, hear her father's slow, grave, deliberate voice, meet and talk to some of the girls in the little town with the river running through it. But she could not go home, ever; her father had said— Just then Mr. Warrill walked in briskly. It was as though a breath of fresh, cool air had come into the room; as though the lights had suddenly started to dance. The entire class sat up, took on new life; there were smiles and cheery greetings around the room. Mr. Warrill planked down a timeworn black brief case, brown at the edges where the leather was curling away from the seams.

"Well, who's dead?" he remarked cheerily. A laugh went around the long table.

"Nobody now," ventured one of the prettier girls, daringly. Mr. Warrill regarded her with a smile which Lolita begrudged, since it had not been directed toward her.

"That being the case," he continued gravely, "I suppose there's no real need for the music from that ghastly shutter—there's enough Poe-like atmosphere in here, tonight, God knows, without it—reminds me of the first sentence in 'The Fall of the House of Usher.'" Two boys rose and managed to silence the shutter. Suddenly Lolita felt Mr. Warrill's eyes upon her.

"As I live," he began, "Miss Farrar has at last favored us with a bit of narrative; quite a bit, judging by the size of the parcel under her arm. Since we've never read anything of hers, perhaps we'd better have a look. Miss Farrar, please—"

Frightened almost to death, Lolita handed over the bundle of manuscript paper; she wished to heaven that she had not brought it, hadn't written the thing at all. She would positively die in her chair if he should read it aloud. She watched in mute agony as he undid the string, shuffled the papers of manuscript, a look of amazement upon his face.

"Thanks, tremendously, Miss Farrar," he said, with the slightest humorous gleam in his deep brown eyes. "for having broken one spell anyhow. At last a member of the class has succeeded in getting beyond twelve hundred words with a story. This must be five thousand words at least; I was afraid it wasn't in any of you." As he talked, he glanced over the pages, reading snatches to himself here and there. Suddenly he leaned back in his chair and commenced reading from the beginning.

Lolita squirmed and writhed, but as he read she realized that it was, after all, not half bad. She had poured her very heart's blood into it, translated the agony of those hours in a cell, the brutal questioning of the police captain; the horror of Harvey dead at her feet; the humorous unmorality of Gertrude, into a living piece of writing, so changed and so camouflaged that it would be impossible for anyone reading it, or hearing it read, to identify the thing with the story which appeared in the papers some time previous. She looked around at the other members of the class to see how they were taking it. They sat, for the most part, with blank, expressionless faces, with the exception of the pert, rather pretty girl who had made the complimentary remark to Mr. Warrill when he had come in. She was grinning in a contemptuous sort of way. Lolita bit her tongue and twisted her fingers under the table. The only effect, apparently, that the story was having upon the class, was to bore all of them, except one, to the point of annihilation, and to make that one think that it was funny—funny—of all things, those pages which, it seemed to Lolita, must be almost red.

At last Mr. Warrill finished the story. He laid the manuscript upon the table. For a moment it was very quiet in the room. Lolita could feel her face burning.

Mr. Warrill said, after a moment, a little impatiently:

"Well, what does the class think of it?" The class began to express itself.

"It's a knockout!" contributed one youth.

"The berries!" insisted a third.

"Better than lots in the magazines," offered another; but Lolita noticed that these were all boys. Suddenly Mr. Warrill turned upon Miss Pringle, the young lady who had complimented him. She was a dainty little thing, a post-graduate of Wellesley. She sometimes wrote dainty little Hergesheimerish short stories of about five hundred words, full of fragile tea cups and naive emotions.

"Well, if I may be pardoned for saying so," she prefaced, "I thought that it was a little crude—that is, I believe that perhaps it might have some commercial possibilities, but—"

"Oh! be yourself," reproved Mr. Warrill, cutting in. "It's far and away the best thing turned in yet; in fact it's the best thing ever turned in to me since I've been with Southwestern, in any class. It's alive; it's real. The characters in it are living, breathing human beings."

"But the sentence structure and the style," objected another rather pretty feminine member of the class.

"Style be hanged!" retorted Mr. Warrill; "style is secondary to the illusion of reality; and it has that in large chunks. I'll willingly trade style for convincingness anytime." Suddenly Lolita, who dared not look up, felt his eyes upon her.

"Miss Farrar, this is the first thing turned in yet that I feel justified in advising submission to a magazine. Since it is a confession story in the popular connotation of the word—a first-person story, to put it more correctly, I wish that you would send it to a magazine, and let me know the result." Several of the girls tittered; even the boys looked incredulous.

"I have an idea," went on Mr. Warrill, a little disconcerted by the titters, "that it will sell for a good price." Since he evidently was not joking the others stopped taking it as a joke. Throughout another hour of class Lolita was as oblivious to what was going on as if she were in another room. Was it really possible that she could write, and be paid for it . . . had she really won the approval of Mr. Warrill, or was he perhaps just 'kidding' her. She decided to remain after the class was over and make sure, but then, she reflected, that would not do any particular good either, for the feminine members of the class always remained, and even some of the boys; poor Mr. Warrill had a terrible time getting away from them. It suddenly occurred to her, however, that she had seen him late one afternoon going into a little old-fashioned Greek restaurant about a block from the school. Possibly he always went there for supper after class, after he had gotten rid of the students, who adored him. When class was over she went to the little restaurant and chose a table over in one corner. Sure enough, after what seemed like hours, Mr. Warrill came in, glanced about the room, saw her, and came over and sat down.

"Well, you certainly handed me a surprise tonight," he began. "I didn't suspect that it was in you, that story. It was marvelous; it stays in one's mind. You'll sell it, beyond the shadow of a doubt; and then your troubles will begin."

"Troubles?" echoed Lolita, who had hoped that the end of troubles might possibly be in sight. "Whatever on earth—?"

"Young lady," he reproved, "don't try to fool an old hand. I know how you came to write that story, you've lived most of it; Oh, I don't mean exactly as it was written, but you've lived something mighty close to it. The fact that you could do it shows that you have unquestioned talent and latent ability; but the question is, will you have the grit and patience to develop into a writer of purely imaginative tales; that is, will you be able to fabricate stories out of whole cloth—now that you've gotten your own story off your chest."

"With your help I am positive that I can; and I'll try ever so hard. I'm studying every moment that I possibly can."

He stopped to give his order and then smiled across at her.

Tells of Witnessing Volcano in Eruption

Joseph H. Sinclair, representing the American Geographic society, has returned to this country from a hard trip of exploration through Ecuador, where he had a terrific experience in an endeavor to reach a smoking volcano which had erupted, the whole country for miles around being deluged with a flow of lava. The natives had a wholesome superstitious fear of the great pile and could not be induced to guide the explorer as near as he wanted to go, but by his own efforts and alone he managed to get within seven miles of the cone and this was near enough for him to witness a number of explosions which repeatedly changed the contour of the crater's rim. Little or nothing had been known about the volcano and he secured valuable data concerning its character and location.

Mr. Sinclair pointed out that he was not the first white man to see the volcano—a mountain which the natives call Reventador, meaning "Eruptor." Near the place the explorers came on a lone white man who could not tell them how long he had been there nor why he had penetrated so far from civilized association. Nor would he go with them to the mountain. He, too, had been infected by the superstition of the natives, which holds that whenever a human sets foot on the side of the tall volcano Reventador becomes "muy bravo," or very brave.

Time and silence occasionally succeed where all other agencies fail.

Official Traps Man Who Faked Accidents

Charlotte, N. C.—A nation-wide search for a man who has defrauded insurance companies on 300 to 400 claims aggregating $35,000 to $50,000 has recently ended here with the arrest of Charles Little by Herbert W. Hargrave, an insurance official.

Little used 40 aliases and worked in virtually every state in the Union. He has begun to serve a six-year term in prison.

His scheme was to trip and fall in department stores and hotels and then to collect sums ranging from $27 to $100 when owners or managers sought to make a speedy settlement.

GIRL'S DANDER UP, ROUTS 3 BANDITS

Was Well Scared Till One Called Her Names.

New York.—Pauline E. Fessler, twenty, sat alone in the office of her father's firm, the East River Sheet Metal works, recently preparing the weekly pay roll.

When an armed bandit abruptly entered and covered the girl with his revolver she was thoroughly frightened. He ordered her to hand over the money spread out before her—$285—and she hastily obeyed.

Then he commanded her to open a safe standing in a corner of the office. She dropped to her knees in front of the safe. So scared was she that her hands shook and she could hardly turn the dial. In fact, so great was her fright that she forgot the combination of the safe.

"I can't open it," she pleaded.

The bandit stood beside her with his revolver pressed against her side.

"Quit your stalling," he warned her. Again she fumbled with the dial.

Just then a second bandit entered. With a third accomplice he had been keeping under cover the six men in the shop outside the office, and he had come now to see what was delaying his pal in the office. He saw Pauline on her knees before the safe but the safe still closed. He swore at her. He called her names.

And at that Pauline's courage and presence of mind came crowding back to her. She stood up, she lifted her head.

"Just for that," she said tartly, "I won't open the safe."

She doesn't remember what happened after that, but one of the men held under cover in the shop beyond the office could see in through the glass partition. He saw the girl pick up pens, telephone books, paperweight—everything that lay on the desk, including the blotter—and throw them in the faces of the two men. The bandits hurried away from there.

Tailors Fight Scissors Duel for Girl's Hand

Budapest.—Scissors were selected as the proper weapons when Antal Sztefanek and Janos Leiser, two Budapest tailors, decided to settle an affair of the heart in true knightly fashion.

Antal and Janos quarreled over a girl. In Hungary it is customary to settle such quarrels with a duel. Usually light sabers are used, due care being taken that neither party can be severely cut.

These two rivals had heard of duels but were not aware of the precautionary measures which "gentlemen duellers" take when defending their honor. They decided to settle their differences in real earnest.

Leiser is now minus part of his nose and Sztefanek part of an ear. Both have a number of gashes on the face; and both will have to explain their fight to a police magistrate as soon as they are released from the hospital. Though still practiced, duelling is forbidden by law.

"Love Thy Neighbor" Is No Mere Ideal Here

Oconto Falls, Wis.—"Love thy neighbor as thyself" is more than a phrase to farmers near here. They have exemplified it by rebuilding the burned farm home of a struggling widow with eight young children.

Almost before the ashes of the home of Mrs. Ernestina Schindel had cooled, neighbors gathered and laid the timbers for a new home.

Mrs. Schindel's husband died three years ago. With him she had worked to clear their wooded land and till it. When he died there were seven children to care for and an eighth was expected. Undaunted, Mrs. Schindel did the work of a farmer and a mother.

Then came the fire. Neighbors found her on the floor in the smoke-filled room and saved her just in time.

How many people you know end their colds with Bayer Aspirin! And how often you've heard of its prompt relief of sore throat or tonsilitis. No wonder millions take it for colds, neuralgia, rheumatism; and the aches and pains that go with them. The wonder is that anyone still worries through a winter without these tablets! New Cloth From Plants

Soon you may be wearing clothes made of kendyr. This is the name of a fiber plant, discovered recently growing in large quantities in Asia, and found to produce textile yarn of high quality. A cloth made half of kendyr and half of cotton, tests show, is attractive and durable. Two tons of kendyr a day is to be turned into cloth by a new machine built for the purpose.—Popular Science Monthly.

LESSON 49

THE HEALTH OF THE HERD: Many a farmer has built up a high producing herd of cows and then found that he had to lose them on account of tuberculosis that might have been avoided thru testing. The health of the herd needs to be considered and guarded as carefully as production.

A good dairy cow may produce profitably until 15 years of age, or have 12 producing years. The average of all cows is less than 6 producing years. Something happens to them so they are no longer profitable. They may fail to breed, or lose part of their udder, or contract tuberculosis, etc.

The state and government are helping to stamp out tuberculosis very effectively, and much of the midwest territory has been tested. It pays to have this test made whether with government aid or without it.

It pays to have ventilation in the barn and sunlight and cleanly conditions. It pays to sweep down the dust and cobwebs and clean out every nook and corner and whitewash and disinfect the barn every fall and spring.

"The Modern Home"

ELECTRIC lighting was once the "last word" in a modern home. Today everyone uses electric lights and a really modern home uses electricity for many other purposes just as necessary as lighting. Electricity has become the general house servant. It cooks, washes, irons, cleans, refrigerates and does many other tasks.

Your "Electric Bill" may now be somewhat larger than your "Lighting Bill" used to be yet small as compared to the valuable service performed.

Drink Water to Help Wash Out Kidney Poison

If Your Back Hurts or Bladder Bothers You, Begin Taking Salts

When your kidneys hurt and your back feels sore don't get scared and proceed to load your stomach with a lot of drugs that excite the kidneys and irritate the entire urinary tract. Keep your kidneys clean like you keep your bowels clean, by flushing them with a mild, harmless salts which helps to remove the body's urinous waste and stimulates them to their normal activity. The function of the kidneys is to filter the blood. In 24 hours they strain from it 500 grains of acid and waste, so we can readily understand the vital importance of keeping the kidneys active.

Drink lots of good water—you can't drink too much; also get from any pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast each morning for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help clean and stimulate clogged kidneys; also to neutralize the acids in the system so they are no longer a source of irritation, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink, which everyone should take now and then to help keep their kidneys clean and active. Try this; also keep up the water drinking, and no doubt you will wonder what became of your kidney trouble and backache.

The king of England bred 200 carrier pigeons for war service and 50 of them received special mention for work at the front.

The duke was particularly interested in Rupert, a war veteran, with part of his beak blown away during a bombing raid in 1917. The bird is eleven years old.

Altogether Rupert carried 403 messages, including the news of the taking of Messines ridge and the evacuation of Lille by the Germans.

He is spending his declining years as the pet of ex-Sergeant Passey, under whose supervision he flew thousands of miles over the battlefields.—From the Continental Edition of the London Daily Mail.

WHEN IT LOOKS DARK to any weak, nervous or ailing woman, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription comes to her aid. Women in every walk of life today say Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a reliable medicine. It is made from roots and herbs, sold by druggists, in both fluid and tablets.

Mrs. L. Phillips, 1008—3rd St., Beloit, Wis., said: "When I was about grown my blood seemed to be thin and I was weak and poor. Finally my mother started giving me Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and in a short time I was well and stout. Mother recommends the 'Favorite Prescription' in general for woman's weakness. She says the value of the 'Prescription' at middle life cannot be overestimated. She knows from her own experience, as she had dizzy spells and could not sleep, but the 'Prescription' made her a well woman."

The municipal council of Kandy, Ceylon, has been urged by the automobile interests to protect travelers against the trains of elephants which carry merchandise along the roads by day and night. The dirty gray of the local elephant is practically invisible at dusk. The council is therefore proposing that every elephant carry a head and tail light.

TWO RIBBONS MARK LINCOLN'S BIBLE

Did Chance or the President Place Them There?

Washington.—Was it chance that left two white silk ribbon markers at passages particularly appropriate to the stress of the Civil war in the Bible upon which Abraham Lincoln took the oath of office, or did the hand of the President himself place them there?

The book is now in the permanent keeping of the Library of Congress. It was placed there last spring by Mrs. Robert Todd Lincoln together with the old family Bible of Abraham Lincoln and the gold medal presented to Mrs. Lincoln by the citizens of France after President Lincoln's death.

The two markers were left at the thirty-first chapter of Deuteronomy and the fourth chapter of Hosea. Both chapters contain verses particularly appropriate to the dark days through which Lincoln passed soon after taking the oath of office.

The sixth verse of the first named chapter reads: "Be strong and of good courage, fear not nor be afraid of them, for the Lord thy God, He it is that doth go with thee, He will not fail thee nor forsake thee."

The first three verses of the fourth chapter of Hosea, where the other marker rests, are as follows:

"Hear ye the word of the Lord, ye children of Israel, for the Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land because there is no truth nor mercy nor knowledge of God in the land. By swearing and lying and killing and stealing and committing adultery they break out and blood toucheth blood. Therefore, shall the land mourn and every one that dwelleth therein shall languish with the beasts of the fields, and with the fowls of heaven, yea, the fishes of the sea also shall be taken away."

Open Hall of Fishes at American Museum

New York.—The American Museum of Natural History has opened a hall of fishes, where visitors may see for themselves the records that cause scientists to believe that possibly land animals once came from the sea.

A few fishes living today have true lungs by which they breathe even after the water in which they live has dried up. Specimens of these fish are on exhibition, with four legs in the shape of paddles, which are the equivalent of fore and hind legs of land animals. The theory, is that these fish belong to long-past ages. They come from Australian and African waters and are named lung-fish.

The exhibits grade fish, showing in the highest types the fighting tarpon and trout, whose ability to escape after being hooked furnishes one of the chief pleasures of anglers.

3 Belted Kingfishers Seen at Grand Canyon

Grand Canyon, Ariz.—The Grand Canyon National park recently received a visit from three belted kingfishers, a species that previously was unknown among the bird life of the park. The three birds were observed by park employees along the Bright Angel creek on the north rim of the canyon. Their occurence in this region indicates that they followed the torturous path of the Colorado river through a semiarid region where it must have been a difficult matter for even their sharp eyes to perceive food in the muddy waters. Bright Angel creek with its clear water, trout and native minnows afforded an excellent resting place for these traveling avian fishermen.

Art Center

New York.—The art center of the United States is Aurora, Ill. That is the deduction of officials of the Grand Central Art galleries from per capita ownership of masterpieces.

Seek to Grow Fruits, Gardens in Labrador

Amherst, Mass.—Prof. F. C. Sears, head of the pomology department of Massachusetts Agricultural college, who spent the summer in Labrador, investigating the possibilities of increasing the production of food plants, recently told of his observations concerning the agricultural problems of the country. The trip was made at the invitation of Sir Wilfred T. Grenfell, who is particularly anxious to introduce fruits and a greater variety of vegetables.

As a result of Professor Sears visit, plans are being made to send fruit trees, bushes, vines and vegetable seeds to be grown and tested in Labrador. One of the miniature "experiment stations" will be located on Doctor Grenfell's private grounds at St. Anthony.

BILLY GOAT CONSTANT PAL OF TRICK HORSE

Follows His Equine Idol Wherever He Goes.

Charleston, S. C.—For several years Moonbeam, a trick horse, and Bill, a bearded black goat of no particular ancestry, have been inseparable companions. The story of their friendship is the story of Bill's admiration for Moonbeam.

Once Moonbeam did Bill a service, and now Bill will sleep nowhere but in Moonbeam's stall. When Moonbeam takes their master, Dr. W. H. Price, for a ride, Bill goes along, and does whatever Moonbeam does. This is sometimes hard, for Moonbeam is an accomplished hurdler, which little Bill decidedly is not, and many times the goat has come to grief in his attempts to copy the actions of his equine idol.

It is a long story, and begins with Moonbeam. Several years ago, when his age was three, Moonbeam belonged to a farmer, and was known as "a mean critter, right enough." He had never been ridden nor driven, and the only way to enter his pasture with safety, was first to drive him into his stall with rocks.

Bought by Doctor.

One day Doctor Price, who was then county inspector of meats, went to the country for a vacation and saw the horse. When he was told of the animal's vicious disposition he took a heavy club, entered the pasture, and when Moonbeam rushed forward to attack him struck him on the nose. The horse was so surprised that that afternoon he let himself be saddled and ridden, and Doctor Price bought him and made of him a well behaved animal, with numerous tricks in his bag, including kneeling at command and rolling over.

And now enters Bill on the end of a string held in the hand of a small boy with a tear-stained face. His father had told him he could not keep Bill, but must take him to the city slaughter house to be killed. Fortunately for Bill, the superintendent of the slaughter house was a kind-hearted man. He bought Bill and promised not to kill him.

For some time Bill dwelt unmolested in the slaughter house stable where Moonbeam had a stall all his own. One day in November, 1927, Bill broke a leg, and next morning was found lying in the corner of Moonbeam's exclusive stall, with Moonbeam guarding him from intruders. Even Doctor Price could not enter the stall until he had pacified the horse.

Lives With Horse.

In a few weeks Bill was well again, and every one supposed he would go out on his own. But no—he stayed with Moonbeam.

Bill had refused food before. Now he ate heartily, but only in the presence of the horse. How much he admired his equine benefactor was soon shown when Moonbeam was taken out to try some hurdles. The goat trotted alongside.

They came to the first hurdle and the horse went over easily. Bill stopped short, eyed the fence, and then, with a mighty standing leap came within inches of the top, but crashed back to the ground. Native cunning prompted him to run around the hurdle and catch up with Moonbeam, but he had learned the trick and cleared the next hurdle by inches.

Then Moonbeam did his stunt of kneeling, and Bill promptly knelt beside him. Moonbeam rolled over, and Bill instantly did the same, and got his horns stuck so fast in the sand he had to be helped to his feet.

Nowadays the two share a stall on their master's estate on Jolly island, a fashionable suburb of Charleston. The islands is full of goats running at large, but Bill never even bats an eye at them. His one and only interest is Moonbeam. So content is he that when it becomes necessary to take the horse out alone Bill has to be tied in his stall, where he whimpers until Moonbeam is brought back again.

Philadelphia.—A page and a half of the original manuscript of Charles Dickens' famous "Pickwick Papers" brought $9,000 at an executor's sale of books and historical documents of the collection of George W. Childs, publisher, who died in 1894.

On the faded yellow paper, still well preserved, is the conclusion of the sixteenth chapter of the story. The paper is signed "Charles Dickens" and "Boz," one of his noms de plume, and dated 1838. It was purchased by Charles Sessler, a collector.

Artificial Legs in Shop Windows Menace Morals

London.—Artificial legs for the display of silk stockings in shop windows are a menace to public morals, in the opinion of Rev. P. Y. Knight, vicar of the village of Ryehope, near Sunderland. When the vicar gazed upon a display in the shop of the local draper, he paid the draper the price of the legs, on condition that they be taken from the window and burned.

CUPID'S ACTIVITY CRAMPED BY COLD

Fewer Single Girls Found in Warmer Cities.

Madison, Wis. — Cold weather cramps the activity of Cupid. More girls between fifteen and twenty-four years of age living in warm climates get married than girls of the same class in colder temperature cities, a survey submitted in the school of commerce at the University of Wisconsin reveals.

The warmer the climate the better chance a girl has to get married. In twelve southern cities of 100,000 or more population, having annual mean temperatures ranging from 59 to 69 degrees, 27 per cent of the native white women are single, the study finds.

In twelve northern cities of the same class, on the other hand, 33 per cent of the women are single, the annual mean temperature in these cities ranging from 45 to 48 degrees.

Smaller cities with populations between 25,000 and 100,000, however, do not show such a high correlation between temperatures and marriages. In fifteen warm cities of this class, with annual temperatures running from 60 to 70 degrees, the percentage of single women is 26. In fifteen colder cities of this class, with annual mean temperature from 38 to 48 degrees, 30 per cent of the women are single.

The statistics for the survey are based on the 1920 census report. For the temperatures the United States weather bureau, the World almanac, and Climatology of the United States were used.

The percentages necessarily had to be corrected when the percentage of men exceeded the percentage of women or vice versa, the survey states.

Of the 144 cities included in the survey, Superior, Wis., had the lowest annual mean temperature, 38 degrees. In that city 37.3 per cent of the native white females are single. The highest mean annual temperature was that of Tampa, Fla., 72 degrees. In that city, 20.4 per cent of the native white women are single. This shows a difference of 16.9 per cent between the coldest and warmest city.

Public as Judge of Art Displays Expert Taste

Washington.—The public is about as good a judge of paintings as artists and professional art critics, directors of the noted Corcoran Art gallery of Washington have found out.

The Corcoran gallery, at its biennial exhibitions of contemporary American oil paintings, conducted a public referendum among the visitors to the exhibition on their choice as the best painting. A painting by Gari Melchers of New York, called "A Native of Virginia," was selected. It shows an old country woman leaning on a grubbing hoe.

Melchers, in previous exhibitions, has won second, third and fourth respectively, in choices made by a jury of leading artists and critics of the country.

C. Powell Minnigerode, director of the gallery, said the picture unquestionably was one of the most noted in the exhibition. A $200 prize went to the artist.

Melchers was born in Detroit in 1860 and has gained considerable renown, both in the United States and in foreign countries. He has been awarded decorations by Bavaria, France and Germany for his paintings.

Entomologists' Value Revealed by Institute

Pittsburgh, Pa.—The absent-minded professor who scampers after elusive butterflies and bugs with a net contributes much to the benefit of humanity.

Carnegie Institute of Technology here has more than 1,500,000 specimens of bugs, beetles, etc., and officials point out that study of myriad insects, gathered from near and far, reveals which is beneficial to mankind, and discloses how to rid infested places of harmful insects.

Pittsburgh is the home of four outstanding figures in the entomological world. Dr. W. J. Holland, director emeritus of Carnegie museum, has a personal collection of specimens gathered from the four corners of the earth. Dr. Hugo Kahl, a native of Sweden, presides over the museum's collection. Associated with him are two others—H. G. Klages and B. Krautwurm, both well-known entomologists.

Ancient Gothic Ruins Reveal Old Metropolis

Backtchisarai, Crimea.—Far-stretching ruins of a great city of unknown origin have been discovered in the valley of Eski-Kermen in the very heart of the Crimean peninsula.

The ruins are said to extend more than two miles, and consist of high fortress walls, hundreds of homes hewed out of rocks and six great cave temples, embellished with ancient frescoes. Russian archeologists said the ruins were once the capital of the Goth's kingdom, known in history as the city of Feodora, founded during the reign of Justinian the Great.

"The Susan Jane Gift Shop"

By MARTHA BLAKE

(Copyright.)

THESE words painted in a vivid violet on a soft blue background, startling, but not inharmonious, greeted young Dr. Lester Clark when he arrived at last at the objective of his long trip to the East. They were on a large wooden sign that swung alongside of the door of his father's old office on Beverley avenue, in his old home town of Sprucehurst.

Lester Clark had not actually lived in Sprucehurst for a decade or so. He had gone away to college and medical school, with only vacations spent at home. Then his father, old Doctor Clark, had died suddenly while Lester was an interne at a big New York hospital, an aunt had closed the house, disposed of the furniture in storage or at the second-hand stores. Now Lester was determined to go back to the old home town of Sprucehurst to begin again where his father had left off.

The old house which had belonged to Lester's aunt was tenantless, Lester had heard. He had come back to Sprucehurst without visiting his aunt in the city, bent first on buying the house through her agent and then settling down at his father's old stand.

It would be a sad homecoming, finding his old home so lonely and desolate. There were crisp white curtains within, and piled neatly on a table just within one window was a pyramid of gayly colored knitting wools.

Lester Clark stood looking rather blankly at the Susan Jane Gift shop. Just beyond the pile of gay wools he caught sight of a neatly coiffed chestnut head. The head was bent as if its owner was intent on fine work. Doubtless this was Susan Jane.

So Lester Clark went to the office of Quick & Snell before taking time to look up any of his old friends in Sprucehurst. Mr. Quick was embarrassed. Still he felt sure that within a day or so matters could be adjusted. Miss Jane—Susan Jane—would be told. Doubtless she would see the situation and would want to open her shop somewhere else.

It was later in the day after Mr. Quick had called on Susan Jane and received her firm refusal to vacate the premises.

Lester Clark had so definitely made up his mind on starting in in his father's old office that this information seemed to leave him at sea.

It was on Lester's third call that first day, after they had read through the lease with the greatest scrutiny, that Mr. Quick seemed to see a way out.

"Of course," he said with a mild smile on his face, "it isn't likely that Susan Jane will remain in business—as it were—indefinitely."

"Isn't she making it go?"

"That isn't it. She really seems to be going very well. The point is that Miss Jane is more than commonly attractive. I know of two—I might say three—young men who would marry her tomorrow if she consented."

Lester had a distinct anticipatory image of this Susan Jane person—aggressive, calculating, possibly pretty; just the kind of woman that would appeal to Quick, with a horizon that stretched only from one business deal to another.

Still Lester decided that he would try to appeal to the sentiment of this unyielding Susan Jane person if he could.

Susan Jane proved disarming. There was nothing the least aggressive or stubborn in her appearance. She stood before him as he explained, her shadowless blue eyes opened round, looking straight into his. They were disconcerting, those eyes, and as Susan Jane stood there the picture of trustful innocence he did not know whether the [illegible] Susan Jane beneath was laughing at him; whether she was about to yield to his request, or whether she was really flirting with him just a little. The effect was ' Lester Clark didn't carry out his errand just as he had planned it. When he had finished his explanation Susan Jane laughed, a spontaneous, easy laugh, like that of a child, and Lester found that he was laughing with her.

When he left he shook hands, and with a boldness unlike him held the hand and drew Susan Jane a step nearer to him as he looked again into the blue eyes. "Be a good girl, now, and give up the lease," he said.

"When are you coming again?"

"Tomorrow," he said, and they both laughed. He was almost out the door and turned back. "I have heard that you may have to give up anyway," he said. "Mr. Quick says you will probably get married."

"Perhaps I shall," she said.

Doctor Clark's courtship was a quick one. His days were spent in pursuit of Susan Jane, fathoming those eyes and waiting for the intoxication of her laugh, and at night after he was away from her he used to steal time from thinking of her to make plans about the office when he had his sign in place of the violet and blue one. He proposed within a week of his return to Sprucehurst. Susan Jane accepted. The next day he gained her promise to be married within the month.

"And I suppose people will say that the only reason you married me was to get me out of my shop," laughed Susan Jane.

OLD FOLKS SAY DR. CALDWELL WAS RIGHT

The basis of treating sickness has not changed since Dr. Caldwell left Medical College in 1875, nor since he placed on the market the laxative prescription he had used in his practice.

He treated constipation, biliousness, headaches, mental depression, indigestion, sour stomach and other indispositions entirely by means of simple vegetable laxatives, herbs and roots. These are still the basis of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, a combination of senna and other mild herbs, with pepsin.

The simpler the remedy for constipation, the safer for the child and for you. And as you can get results in a mild and safe way by using Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, why take chances with strong drugs?

A bottle will last several months, and all can use it. It is pleasant to the taste, gentle in action, and free from narcotics. Elderly people find it ideal. All drug stores have the generous bottles, or write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. BB, Monticello, Illinois, for free trial bottle.

Lobster Was a Giant

What is believed to be one of the largest lobsters ever caught is now owned, in a preserved state, at Matunuck Point beach, Conn. Taken in a drag net near Block Island, it weighed 28 pounds and yielded 15 pounds of meat. With claws extended it is four feet nine inches wide. It is estimated to be seventy years old.

Lots of folks who think they have "indigestion" have only an acid condition which could be corrected in five or ten minutes. An effective anti-acid like Phillips Milk of Magnesia soon restores digestion to normal.

Phillips does away with all that sourness and gas right after meals. It prevents the distress so apt to occur two hours after eating. What a pleasant preparation to take! And how good it is for the system! Unlike a burning dose of soda—which is but temporary relief at best—Phillips Milk of Magnesia neutralizes many times its volume in acid.

Man's first effort to control the Mississippi was by building levees. The first planters thus sought to protect their own plantations and passed the danger along to the next fellows. Gradually the levees were enlarged and extended until they now form a set of parallel banks long enough to reach from New York to Chicago. They have cost, so far, more than $250,000,000.

Denver Mother Tells Story

Nature controls all the functions of our digestive organs except one. We have control over that, and it's the function that causes the most trouble.

See that your children form regular bowel habits, and at the first sign of bad breath, coated tongue, biliousness or constipation, give them a little California Fig Syrup. It regulates the bowels and stomach and gives these organs tone and strength so they continue to act as Nature intends them to. It helps build up and strengthen pale, listless, underweight children. Children love its rich, fruity taste and it's purely vegetable, so you can give it as often as your child's appetite lags or he seems feverish, cross or fretful.

Leading physicians have endorsed it for 50 years, and its overwhelming sales record of over four million bottles a year shows how mothers depend on it. A Western mother, Mrs. R. W. Stewart, 4112 Raritan St., Denver, Colorado, says: "Raymond was terribly pulled down by constipation. He got weak, fretful and cross, had no appetite or energy and food seemed to sour in his stomach. California Fig Syrup had him romping and playing again in just a few days, and soon he was back to normal weight, looking better than he had looked in months."

Protect your child from imitations of California Fig Syrup. The mark of the genuine is the word "California" on the carton.

THE STORY

Influenced by loneliness, without relatives, or real friends, in Chicago, Lolita Forbes, young and pretty, yields to the importunities of Harvey Torrence, with whom she fancies herself in love. She discovers his true character and leaves him, taking refuge with an acquaintance, Gertrude Watson. Lolita is accosted by the son of the wealthy owner of the apartments, Fred Watterson. She repulses his advances, but he insists on driving her to the store. On the street Torrence is waiting. He puts the worst construction on Lolita's being with Watterson, and the two men engage in a fistic battle in which Torrence is killed. Lolita spends a night of misery in a police cell. She informs her father, by wire, of her situation, but he answers that he "never wants to see her face again." Next morning the judge, at the instigation of a lawyer, a stranger to Lolita, dismisses the case. The lawyer gives her $200 and an unsigned note informing her that college tuition has been paid for a year. He refuses to give the name of her benefactor. She takes up short story writing and meets Mr. Warrill. Lolita writes a short story which Mr. Warrill praises highly.

"Great," he said enthusiastically; "there has never been anyone in my class that I could take more pleasure in helping, and I shall also have something interesting and encouraging to report to Mr. What'shisname now."

"Whatshisname?"

"Yes, I only know him as 'Charlie. He drops in at the paper every once in a while, where I write book reviews in the morning, and wants to know how you're getting along. He'll be just tickled silly when I tell him about your wonderful story."

"Is he," said Lolita breathlessly, "a rather small man with graying hair and serious gray eyes?"

"Hair and eyes, hair and eyes," mocked Mr. Warrill lightly. "It's the very first thing a girl sees with her eyes! Yes, that's him, to a T; to a pair of T's."

"I hope you won't misunderstand, Mr. Warrill. He's—he's never even met me; I'm sure I don't know why he takes such an interest in me, but please don't think that—" He leaned back to laugh boyishly.

"Listen to her," he commented, starting upon his soup; "as if I'd ever be led to believe that little Miss Prim would have a snappy love affair with an oldish man with 'graying hair and gray eyes.' Why, my dear, you wouldn't have nerve enough to have an affair like that, you haven't got it in you." His eyes challenged her mischievously and maddeningly as he sipped his soup. She had an inward pang of compunction as she realized how wrong he was, and how little he would think of her if he knew how wrong he was. Her face clouded as she reflected that she would have given anything in the world to be able to know that she was good enough for this man whom she had grown to love more than she had ever dreamed it possible for her to love anyone. Unconsciously she sighed aloud. He shook his head at her reprovingly.

"Don't be silly," he objected; "I can imagine, from various things in that story of yours, that you've had a pretty hard time of it, but, heavens, that's nothing. Why, it's almost good for you. Remember that crack of Eddy Guest's about 'It takes a lot of livin' in a house to make it a home'? Well, it takes a heap of livin to make a writer, everything else being equal. You start right away to write another story. I want another one from you inside of a month."

She promised him that she would and then sat, elbows upon the table, silently contemplating him as he received the balance of his order from the waiter. What an extra-strength double-dear he was. She wondered with a poignant little regret why she could never see the slightest flicker of admiration for her person in his eyes, such as she had been accustomed to seeing in men's eyes ever since she had been thirteen or fourteen; and then it came over her with terrible force, for the first time, just why this was. She had been so used to thinking of herself, as herself, that she had forgotten what she had done to herself—the plain apparel, the hideous spectacles, the hair dyed out of synchronism with her natural vivid coloring. Suddenly, in frightful agitation, she rose.

"I must be going, Mr. Warrill," she said stiffly.

"Aha!" he commented admiringly; "the young authoress is seized of another plot. I'll bet, go on home and pound it out, see you Friday." She nodded briefly and walked out, leaving Mr. Warrill to wonder to himself why it was that invariably good-looking girls were dumb, and smart, intelligent girls were plain looking. Now, that Miss Farrar, for instance—charming, intelligent girl, but colorless, no taste for dress, those distorting spectacles, suppose one ought to wholly admire a girl for her intellectuality; but the human animal was so made that it was impossible so to do. Dismissing the whole matter with a shrug, he turned to his steak. Too bad, though—darn nice girl, but oh, so plain!

CHAPTER V

Lolita had, of course, taken no real stock in what Mr. Warrill had said about her chances of selling her story. When, one morning, a month later, Mrs. Hardy, the woman from whom she rented her room, brought the return envelope which she had enclosed with the story upstairs she was immediately struck by its thinness. Opening it she found a check for $350.

"We are paying you," the inclosed letter said, "five cents a word, our highest word rate, for your seventy-five hundred word story, 'Good Intentions' in the hope that this will spur you on to send more of your work immediately."

In a perfect fever of excitement Lolita phoned Mr. Warrill to tell him the good news. To her chargrin he seemed not the least surprised.

"Don't Be Silly," He Objected.

"Well," his slightly drawling voice said over the 'phone, "I told you you'd sell it, didn't I? and it's no wonder that they want more of your work. Go to it, kid; I think you will eventually catch up on Madame Glyn—if you hurry." His husky laugh followed this sally.

Lolita had by now, a little begun to get over the fear she had had of the circumstances attendant upon and following the death of Harvey and, one day calling the court in which she had appeared, she asked for the clerk, and got the name of the lawyer who had defended her.

Going immediately down to his office she found him in and told him something of her good fortune.

"That's fine," he said, stroking his hair and not exhibiting any real interest. "Charlie—er—that is, the man who hired me to defend you, will be mighty pleased to hear it, I'm sure."

"That's what I came down for," hastily interposed Lolita. "I want to give him part of this three hundred and fifty dollars to help square accounts and start paying him back all that he has spent upon me. Won't you please give me his name and address?"

"I will not," said the lawyer, sitting abruptly forward in his seat in palpable alarm; and, besides, he wouldn't take the money, anyway. Three hundred and fifty dollars means about as much to him as three cents would to you. Why bother about it; go out and spend it, or put it in the bank, or do anything you like with it, but don't expect me to tell you any names. However, if you ever feel like seeing him real bad, just pull something wrong that you oughtn't to and he'll probably turn up, all right. I don't know for sure, but I imagine that he's got some one watching you most all the time."

"But why should he?" persisted Lolita.

"Oh, don't get excited. He's not a bit in love with you. He had his reason, and, personally, I'd say it was a darn good one. Just you run along now and don't be trying to kid an old lawyer into telling you something he oughtn't to."

Mystified, Lolita left the office. She felt sad and happy and restless. There was a terrible beauty ache inside of her. She wanted to be pretty again, pretty for—but then, she hardly dared say the name even to herself, it stirred her so. Almost before she knew it she found herself in the great department store where she had always before shopped, when she could afford to do any shopping. The check fairly burned her purse in its anxiety to get out and pay for some of the pretty things that she saw on all sides; and, at last, yielding to temptation, she bought some new underwear, a new dress and hat, and some sleazy, flesh-colored silk stockings. She had no definite idea as to just what she would do with the things, but just to own them was something.

Going home, she regretfully climbed into the bathtub; regretfully because she had hoped that perhaps Mr. Warrill might call her and ask her to go for a spin in the snappy, gray little roadster she had once or twice seen him leave school in. As she bathed she reflected sadly that there was little chance that he would have any time for a girl who had deliberately made herself homely; and, too, this fact proved that he could not possibly love her, for, even though she were to make herself beautiful for him, it would be something purely upon the surface that he would then fall in love with. This thought made her sad. She washed her hair, remembering that this would necessitate its being soaked in dye again for an hour afterward. With a little poignant regret she examined the yellow-gold, fluffy hair in the mirror before she again applied the darkening, discoloring, deadening dye. It seemed a shame, yet there was no help for it, this was part of her punishment.

The following day, armed with another "confession" story, she arrived at class a little earlier than the rest, spurred on by the glorious news that she had to tell.

Soon the others came in and Mr. Warrill, apparently as pleased over her success as she was herself, called the class to order and then said:

"A member of the class has already made a substantial sale to a magazine." Every one looked at Lolita.

"Miss Farrar, I am pleased to say, sold the story we read a week ago, for $350." A wave of astonishment swept around the room. Somehow Lolita felt a little sorry for Miss Pringle; that young lady, she knew, would somehow take it to heart. She was queer about such things, especially when it brought another feminine student into the sun of Mr. Warrill's favor. She glanced out of the corner of her eye at Miss Pringle and was a little surprised to find, instead of an envious look, a look of such extreme venomousness that she was for a moment startled. Even as she watched her Lolita saw the young lady suddenly start to speak, with her eyes boring into her own.

"It is no wonder," began Miss Pringle in biting tones, "that 'Miss Farrar,' as she chooses now to call herself, is so successful. There's a reason for it." Lightly Mr. Warrill cut in.

"Well, perhaps it's something that will help the rest of the class. Tell us what it is, Miss Pringle, and we'll all ape her in it immediately."

"Hardly—" Miss Pringle smiled poisonously; "I, for one, would rather never sell a story than have that reason for being able to write a convincing one." She stopped now, conscious that every eye in the class was turned upon her.

Lolita sank down in her chair, weak with agony. She recalled that Miss Pringle did society notes on a Chicago newspaper with an infinitesimal circulation. Apparently she had seen the photographs of her in the paper, and somehow at least associated them with her.

"'Miss Farrar,'" went on Miss Pringle slowly, "is the Lolita Forbes who was lately mixed up in that slightly odorous Harvey Torrence killing in which young Watterson was involved. She is the one over whom they fought after a night of—well, after a night of adventure not wholly dissimilar from some of the more torrid passages in her late story which drew such a nice price. No wonder!" It seemed to Lolita that the deadly silence which followed this announcement was the most horrible thing she had ever experienced in her life. It was as though she had been suddenly hung suspended in the middle of a terrible black vacuum. The very walls seemed to be closing in upon her.

Fewer Wizards Than Witches in Legends

It is significant that though witch and wizard are equally common in legend and history, the generic name for the thing is witchcraft; there is not quite the same feeling to the word wizardry.

Probably the records will show more witches than wizards. Women are traditionally, actually, wayward hysterical, baffling and unmanageable. For ages the thought of the world was dominated by men, good and true thought and devilish cruel delusion and superstitious thought. What more natural than that man should impute evil powers to the creature who tempts and torments him and should make her suffer from his revengeful sadism? Incubus and succuba exist together in legend, but succuba is more terrifying and fascinating to the male imagination, and it is the male imagination which gave form to myths and legends and controlled all old laws and religions.—The Bookman.

Doing Away With Fear

The cure of fear will have begun when realization comes that worry is economically and otherwise non profitable. Many a neurasthenic has been cured by learning to drive an automobile, to ride a horse, to swim, or by accustoming himself to great heights. In such ways sustaining courage for fear.

Get Rid of Troubles

People in Korea seek to rid themselves of all their distresses by painting images on paper, writing against them their troubles of body or mind, and afterwards giving the papers to a boy to burn. Another method of achieving the same object is to make rude dolls of straw, stuff them with a few copper coins, and throw them into the street. Whoever picks up such an effigy gets all the troubles and thereby relieves the original sufferer.

Eskimos Offer Little Resistance to Colds

The Eskimo never has a cold until he comes in contact with people from the world outside his frozen North. But he has no resistance to colds, and as a result gets one immediately after his first exposure, Dr. Peter Heinbecker and E. I. M. Irvine-Jones, of St. Louis, reported to the Journal of Immunology. These scientists, who made a trip up the west coast of Greenland, noticed that in some places all the natives were suffering from colds while elsewhere none of them was thus afflicted. In the latter places, the Eskimos all developed colds and coughs in from two to four days after the party's arrival. In the former places the colds could all be traced to contact with the outside world. Diphtheria and scarlet fever were unknown.

Holt Tax Rate Decreased

Holt village showed the greatest decrease in tax rates of the various governments in Marshall County from a total of 179.86 mills in 1927 to 141.3 mills in 1928. This is a decrease of 38.56 mills. A year ago Holt had the highest tax rate in the county but this year Middle River village surpassed Holt for the largest rate. The rate in Holt includes the fixed state and county rates plus 89 mills for village purposes and 79.4 mills for operation of school district No. 35.

Increasing its tax rate from 176.96 mills in 1927 to 181.1 mills in 1928, Middle River village is again at the head of all county government in tax rates. The largest part of the rates will be used for operation of the village school, 122 mills being devoted to the purpose, while only 27.8 mills will be used for the village government. This undoubtedly is one of the highest tax rates in the entire state.—Warren Sheaf.

New Attendance Record

All previous attendance records were shattered at the Northwest School of Agriculture when 41 new students, in addition to those who were present during the fall term, passed through the Registrar's office on the opening day of the winter term, January 7. E. R. Clark, acting registrar, reports a total enrollment of 315 for the current year, thus passing for the first time the nine-year record of 301 established during the year 1919-20.

We are this week publishing the statement of condition of the Marshall County State Bank, and which shows the local institution has done a very favorable business in 1928. The local bank is rated as one of the best in this part of the state.

KEEP RECORD: Co-operative creameries are successful for different reasons, but one important reason is that the keep accurate records of all their work. They make out a monthly and a yearly report showing the amount of butterfat received from the patrons and what is paid for it, the amount of butter made and sold, and the amount of money received, and the price per pound, and the various items of manufacturing cost, etc.

Farming would be more successful and profitable if more and better records were kept of the business. How much is sold from the farm monthly and yearly, and what is the monthly and yearly income and expenses?. These are important matters to know and to keep in mind, because farms fail when the income is less then expenses. It is not a difficult matter to keep records that will show the income and expenses on the farm.

The importance of keeping such a record is that when the monthly and yearly records show the expenses to be greater than the income it prompts action to either increase the income or lower the expenses, or both. Records lead to a more thoro study of the farm business.

Are You Ready

When your Children Cry for It

Baby has little upsets at times. All your care cannot prevent them. But you can be prepared. Then you can do what any experienced nurse would do—what most physicians would tell you to do—give a few drops of plain Castoria. No sooner done than Baby is soothed; relief is just a matter of moments. Yet you have eased your child without use of a single doubtful drug; Castoria is vegetable. So it's safe to use as often as an infant has any little pain you cannot pat away. And it's always ready for the crueler pangs of colic, or constipation or diarrhea; effective, too, for older children. Twenty-five million bottles were bought last year.

Roads From Rubbish

Salt Lake City has splendid roads that have been built of rubbish. The material is leveled by means of a drag—stoves, baby carriages, bedsteads, etc., being placed by hand.

The dump is then rolled with a 15-ton steel roller, which so smashes everything that it packs even more easily than dirt as a foundation for a screened gravel surface.

TO RESIST THE ATTACK—of colds or grippe—put your system and your blood in order. Build up your health with that splendid herbal tonic, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, which has stood the test of sixty years of approval. The air we breathe is often full of germs, if our vitality is low we're an easy mark for colds or pneumonia.

One who has used the "Discovery", or "G M D", writes thus:

Minneapolis, Minn. "I contracted a cold and became broken-down in health when I was about middle age. I was, in fact, suffering from a complete nervous breakdown. But Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery restored my health and strength. The other medicines I took did me no good. I cannot possibly say too much in its praise. I still take it whenever I feel the need."—Mrs. C. G. Betcher, 3528—15th Ave. S.

The Girl Who Came Back

By Jack Woodford

THE STORY

Influenced by loneliness, in Chicago, Lolita Forbes, young and pretty, yields to the importunities of Harvey Torrence, with whom she fancies herself in love. She discovers his true character and leaves him, taking refuge with an acquaintance, Gertrude Watson. Lolita is accosted by the son of the wealthy owner of the apartments, Fred Watterson. He insists on driving her to the store. On the street Torrence is waiting. He puts the worst construction on Lolita's being with Watterson, and the two men engage in a fistic battle in which Torrence is killed. Lolita spends a night of misery in a police cell. She informs her father, by wire, of her situation, but he answers that he "never wants to see her face again." Next morning the judge, at the instigation of a lawyer, a stranger to Lolita, dismisses the case. The lawyer gives her $200 and an unsigned note informing her that college tuition has been paid for a year. He refuses to give the name of her benefactor. She takes up short story writing and meets Mr. Warrill. Lolita writes a short story which Mr. Warrill praises highly. Miss Pringle, a member of the class, harshly criticises it. The story is sold for $350. Miss Pringle discloses Lolita's real identity.

Trying not to meet the eyes of anyone she rose and fled from the classroom. As she went down the hall, past the registrar's office, Miss Marion called out a cheery greeting to her, and it stabbed her like a knife. What would Miss Marion think of her, what would all of her new-found friends think of her—and just as she had begun to pluck up hope. The scalding tears trickled down her cheeks as she descended in the elevator. A young medical student, who was running it, stopped it between floors sympathetically and said:

"Gee kid, can't I do anything for you? Somebody flunk you? Want me to get you a swell anodyne?"

Grateful for the stop in between floors Lolita fought for composure while the annunciator in the car registered the angry calls for the elevator upon half a dozen floors. She wiped her eyes and tried to make herself presentable. Presently she managed to nod at the young man and he started the car down again.

On the main floor she hurried out of the lobby, dreadfully conscious that she was leaving all this dear and familiar atmosphere of friendly smells and railings that bore the signs of wear of two generations of students, for the last time.

When she reached her room she dared not stop to think. One thing beat itself into her consciousness. She must make herself pretty again. She could no longer stand it to see her ugly ensemble in the glass. At least if she had nothing else, she had youth and beauty; why not make the most of them?

Standing in the middle of the floor she pulled off her clothes, and, slim and pink, ran to the bath. For an hour she splashed around in the tub, a little comforted—as long as she refused to think—by the caress of warm water upon her body. Meticulously she soaked every vestige of dye out of her hair and then climbed out of the bathtub. Her things had come from the store and she went into the next room and unpacked them. It was good to draw on soft, filmy underthings, feel the kiss of virgin silk upon her limbs. Dressing only in the frilly under garments she pirouetted before the long cheval glass on the back of the closet door for several moments. In the frothy black silk underthings, and pink, flesh-colored stockings, she knew, perfectly well, as she looked in the glass that she looked tremendously sweet. If Mr. Warrill could see her now! And yet she didn't want him to. He wouldn't be really loving her. It would be something else unpretty, like poor Harvey!

Donning the new dress, she sat before the mirror and carefully massaged, applied with restraint all of the old cosmetics that she had been accustomed to, and which she had eschewed since the death of Harvey, rubbed brilliantine into her hair, combing it out carefully and curving it at the ends in front, so that a thick curl of it upon each side warmly tickled her cheek. Even she was amazed at the different girl who, at last, appeared in the mirror.

For several moments she sat, chin upon knit fingers, elbows upon the dresser top, surveying herself. She was pretty, startlingly so, and delightfully young, and that was all that was left to her. Her father had said that she might never come home. Mr. Warrill would probably never speak to her again. It was the continuation of her punishment for what she had done. She realized now that all of the gayety which she had affected while dressing had been put on, and now that there was no more dressing to be done, clouds of memories were rolling up upon her, threatening every moment to break over her in a storm. She had tried to be good; had tried to start over as Gertrude had suggested. It hadn't worked. Why, then, go on trying? When she had done what she had, there was no forgiveness; why then try to earn it? Why not just go on, since there was nothing else left to live for? Defiantly she rose and stood by the window looking out. The big white sign of the Montmarte cafe she could see from the back; she caught a glimpse of the red and gold sign full of rippling lights upon the Uptown theater; a little to the left the Riviera sign; there was, she knew, a new cafe over there; she had over a hundred dollars which she had received from the story that afternoon, as change from her check.

"The devil with this heating back stunt," she said at last aloud to herself. She opened the door and passed into the hall, determined to run away from the storm, whose clouds were getting blacker and blacker with each passing moment.

"All Right," Agreed Lolita, Caring Little What Happened to Her.

As she descended the stairs she was vaguely conscious that some one below had just finished a conversation with Mrs. Hardy and was starting up the stairs. On the landing she came face to face with Mr. Warrill. She stopped in amazement directly in his path.

"Pardon me," he said, "but I was in search of Miss—er—Forbes. I wonder if—"

"I'm her sister," cut in Lolita; "she's not up there—I was going to see her myself, but she's apparently gone out for the evening. What, may I ask, if it's not a wholly impertinent question, did you want to see her about?"

"Well," temporized Warrill, "nothing in particular. I just wanted to ask her if certain things were true. I guess it doesn't matter, though."

"Probably not," said Lolita, crisply.

"I'd have known you were her sister even if you hadn't told me," went on Mr. Warrill, fingering his hat. "You are exactly like her in lots of ways; but very different in others." His admiration fairly gleamed from his eyes. Somehow this revolted her. Without a word she hurried on down the stairs, leaving him standing there looking after her. She was more determined than ever now to forget all about the redemption thing that Gertrude had preached but not practiced. She didn't want Mr. Warrill's regard now, even though she could see that she might have it. It wouldn't be worth the having. It was only for the outside of her, the new outside of her. He was just like all other men. There was nothing good or fine or worth having in the world. Outside she turned resolutely, with a final mental toss that caused a physical toss of the head, firmly toward the new cafe.

CHAPTER VI

Walking along with her head down, her mind a wild kaleidoscope of scorn and hopelessness, Lolita suddenly heard a voice close at hand.

"Hello, girlie!" sang out a boy's cheerful voice. Almost without thinking she turned and replied:

"Hello."

She saw a young fellow of perhaps twenty-five at the wheel of a sport coupe; evidently he had seen her from the road, scudded along as she walked, and taken advantage of the first open parking space along the curb to drive in and call to her.

"Going any place in particular?" next asked the youth.

"No, no place in particular," responded Lolita in a dull tone; she was thinking idly, that he was good looking, happy looking, as though he hadn't a trouble in the world.

"Hop into the car," he suggested, "and we'll both go no place in particular." Without a word of remonstrance she climbed into the car.

At once he swung the automobile about and started back. Then he suddenly turned to her.

"The whole trouble with you," he now pronounced airily, "is that you probably don't drink enough." Lolita looked at him in astonishment as he went on. "Yeh, that must be it; you probably don't drink enough. I noticed how d—n blue you looked. Me? Say, I drink plenty, and I always feel fine; I'm heading for the Goose and Gander, and what's good for both. Care?"

"What is the Goose and Gander?" asked Lolita.

"A road house, nine miles out. Swell place. Nobody has ever been able to remember what they were blue about five minutes after they got inside."

"All right," agreed Lolita, caring little what happened to her. After all, what difference did anything make? She had done her level best to redeem herself, she had failed in every particular; there was nothing left to do; the mistake that she had made would never be forgiven. She had often wondered, previous to making it, why girls who made one false step always kept on going downward; it seemed so silly, when all that they needed do was to "Turn to the Right," and start over again. Now she understood.

She was grateful that her companion did not speak to her. She just wanted to sit and half think about almost nothing and watch the night and the lights off in the field in farmhouses rush by and hear the chorus of the crickets, so loud that it sounded above the noise that the car made. Almost she began to feel a little happy.

Presently the car stopped before an old house that looked as though it were sadly in need of repairs. It was perfectly dark, but as she looked about she saw that dozens of other cars, with all of their lights out were parked around near the ramshackle old frame building.

"Come on," prompted her companion, after he had found a parking place and switched off his lights. She allowed him to assist her from the car. They walked up a short flight of steps, opened a rickety door and passed into a darkened hallway. Her companion, holding her arm, pushed her forward. Another door opened and suddenly a burst of music fairly leaped out at them; a blaze of light met them, and, almost before she knew it, Lolita was dancing with her escort.

When the music stopped, and he led her to a seat, she felt almost lighthearted and gay. The place, inside, was a miracle of beauty and perfection, completely giving the lie to the exterior. Well dressed, jolly people were everywhere about. Laughter and happiness seemed literally to saturate everything.

"Something," specified her escort when a waiter approached, "that's good for the Goose and good for the Gander." The waiter nodded and walked off. Presently he was back with what looked like water in two small glasses; but, upon sipping it, Lolita discovered at once that it was quite anything but water. It was more like fire than water. She coughed and choked. Her escort laughed.

Announce Best Flour for Making Pretzels

Pennsylvania was the first home of the pretzel in America. That state to this day leads the Union in the production of this "species of fruit." These, says the Pathfinder Magazine, were some of the incidentals picked up by the Department of Agriculture when it made a search for facts which would determine the flour most suitable for pretzel making.

It was also learned that there are two distinct types of pretzels—the familiar hard pretzel and the soft pretzel, which is intended for consumption the day it is baked. Some of the hard pretzels are machine stamped and others are made by hand.

But the machines are used only in the manufacture of the smaller sizes. The characteristic twisted pretzel is twisted by hand even though the dough is rolled by a machine. No machine has been perfected which will give the particular twist desired. An experienced and skillful operator can twist about twenty-five or thirty pretzels a minute.

The government experts learned that a satisfactory pretzel flour can be made by blending hard wheat flours and soft wheat flours of high and low protein content, or by using a "patent" or "straight" flour with a small percentage of a "clear" flour.

Canada is achieving a reputation as the playground for the whole world. Big game hunters formerly went to Africa for their thrills, but now many of them go to Canada. This is true, also, of those who go in search of smaller game and mountain climbers and even "hikers." It is estimated that visitors to Canada last year spent $275,000,000 during their sojourning in that country.

SPRING RAIN

"Hurry," said Mrs. Turtle, to the little turtles, "the spring is here and it is time to get up."

Soon they were all out of their winter beds of mud and were looking about the pond for the nicest kinds of homes.

"What do you think of this?" asked Mrs. Turtle.

"It is a very fine looking home," said Mr. Turtle as he looked at the home Mrs. Turtle had picked out.

"Let's see how we can fix our porches. We must have three. I could never abide a summer home that had less than three porches."

"No more could I," agreed Mrs. Turtle.

"We like plenty of porches," agreed the little turtles.

"Ah," said Mr. Turtle, twisting his head far out of his shell, "it's so nice that we all like the same things.

"It makes us get along so well. We all like porches. We like to sit upon them in the warm sunshine.

"We enjoy a quiet nap on one of three porches, but we always like to choose between three."

"Yes," said Mrs. Turtle, "it would be such a pity if we only had one porch."

"Just imagine how hard it would be to think, 'Oh dear, which porch shall I take my nap on?' and then remember there was only one porch."

Now the turtles have three logs outside their homes which they call their porches.

Sometimes they are of logs and sometimes of funny, ugly snags which the turtles think are quite beautiful.

"It's going to rain a spring rain," said Mr. Turtle, after they had all decided upon their summer home and were settled upon their porches.

Upon Their Porches.

"How do you know it is?" asked Mrs. Turtle. "You say that in such a decided manner."

"Of course I know you are a wise turtle and know a great deal, but I never before knew you were a weather prophet."

"Are you?"

"I'm not a weather prophet, my dear," said Mr. Turtle, "but I know this time."

"Tell me how you know?" asked Mrs. Turtle.

"Because," explained Mr. Turtle, "I see Mr. Tortoise."

"Does he like the rain so much?" asked Mrs. Turtle.

"Like it!" exclaimed Mr. Turtle. "Gracious, he hates the rain. He simply cannot stand it.

"He thinks the rain is horrid, yes, extremely horrid."

"I don't understand at all," said Mrs. Turtle. "You say you know it is going to rain, and you know because you see Mr. Tortoise in the distance.

"And then you say that Mr. Tortoise hates the rain. It is very confusing."

"Mr. Tortoise hates the rain, and he is the weather prophet," said Mr. Turtle.

"He always knows when it's going to rain and when he sees that it is about to happen, he hurries away where the rain won't touch him.

"I see him hurrying away from an approaching rain storm now. The storm is coming because he's hurrying off—or at least he is hurrying off because the rain is coming.

"Just see if I'm not right. Mr. Tortoise never makes a mistake."

And, sure enough, in a short time, it began to rain—a heavy spring rain and not merely a spring shower.

About Bachelor Buttons

By DEAN DOUGLAS

(Copyright.)

KITTY was making very good progress toward success in business and felt that all was well, except for one fact that stared her continuously in the face.

Kitty had fallen desperately in love with a man whom she had not even met and yet whose smiling eyes haunted even her sleeping dreams.

His was the face that appeared in all the advertisements for Bachelor's Buttons, the patent button that Kitty had put on the market and was selling in huge quantities.

The young man pictured on her buttons was so happy, so completely in harmony with the whole world merely because on his shirts, his pajamas, his trousers and his coats there were the wonderful little buttons that put all people in a good humor—simply because they were there to stay.

Kitty had gazed for hours at the handsome man with the golden mustache and heavy waving hair and the daintily trimmed Van Dyke beard and thought she had never seen anyone so disastrously good looking.

The firm who had got up the advertising pages for Bachelor's Buttons had certainly been in luck when they found the model for their pictures.

Kitty had written straight back to the town in the Middle West and secured the sole agency for the button for the Eastern territory.

The owners of the patent were nice people to deal with and had more than once complimented Kitty on the enormous sales her office was effecting.

All over her office were framed the various advertisements in which Mr. Buttons, as Kitty called him for want of knowing his real name, was postured. She felt sometimes that all was vain in the way of success and the making of money if she was to go lovelorn all the days of her life.

She even went so far as to prowl about some of the advertising offices with a view of picking up information as to where and how models were obtained and whether or not they were usually of the professional type.

Then one bright and shining morning Kitty had a long letter from the firm in the West who manufactured the buttons.

"Would Miss Woodrow be likely to come out and pay a visit to the firm? We feel that we should like to make the acquaintance, in a more personal way, of our Eastern representative and will gladly pay all expenses."

Kitty sat down and pondered over the letter. Certainly she would like a trip out through the West, and, since she was feeling a bit fagged, she wrote back saying she would accept and would take great pleasure in meeting the firm.

When Kitty hopped off the train at Kankatoo in her well-cut costume of beige that so exquisitely matched her soft hair and threw into strong relief the bright blue of her eyes, she smiled at the big chap who seemed waiting for her and her alone.

"You are Miss Woodrow," he queried and Kitty realized that the young man meeting her had not expected—well—perhaps he had been looking for a more business-like person. "I'm John Vickers."

Kitty then smiled and held out her hand. So many letters had passed between these two that somehow the getting acquainted in person was not going to be difficult.

And much to her own disgust she realized that for the first time in two years her heart had leapt at the sight of a man. That organ had reserved all its leaps and bounds for the young man on the button advertisements. She felt truly fickle.

"You know," said Mr. Vickers, confidentially, "you were really the means of putting our firm on the map at all. We were just a little one-horse concern, trying to float the button my dad patented, when your letter came along. It's been wonderful the way you've made a go of it. I'm taking you straight to our home, if you don't mind—my mother is wanting muchly to entertain you."

"I am more than charmed," laughed Kitty, and when Mr. Vickers laughed and she cast a keen glance at him, she knew the whole story.

Young Vickers and her Mr. Buttons were one and the same person.

Her face must have reflected much of her inward elation for young Vickers almost gasped as he looked deep into her eyes.

"I say, I do believe you're as glad to meet us as we are you," he remarked frankly.

"As a matter of fact—perhaps I am more so. Even with that quaint little Van Dyke beard and mustache—I should like to have met you."

Vickers laughed loud and long and very boyishly and happily.

"We didn't even have the price for a regular model—at that time—so they used me and I certainly felt silly about it all."

Kitty smiled softly up at him. "You needn't have," she said, and knew now that all was really well.

WHAT DR. CALDWELL LEARNED IN 47 YEARS PRACTICE

A physician watched the results of constipation for 47 years, and believed that no matter how careful people are of their health, diet and exercise, constipation will occur from time to time. Of next importance, then, is how to treat it when it comes. Dr. Caldwell always was in favor of getting as close to nature as possible, hence his remedy for constipation, known as Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, is a mild vegetable compound. It can not harm the system and is not habit forming. Syrup Pepsin is pleasant-tasting, and youngsters love it.

Dr. Caldwell did not approve of drastic physics and purges. He did not believe they were good for anybody's system. In a practice of 47 years he never saw any reason for their use when Syrup Pepsin will empty the bowels just as promptly.

Do not let a day go by without a bowel movement. Do not sit and hope, but go to the nearest druggist and get one of the generous bottles of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, or write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. BB, Monticello, Illinois, for free trial bottle.

How to Avoid INFLUENZA

Colds Nothing you can do will so effectually protect you against Colds, Influenza or Grippe as keeping your organs of digestion and elimination active and your system free from poisonous accumulations. Nature's Remedy (NR Tablets) does more than merely cause pleasant and easy bowel action. It tones and strengthens the system, increasing resistance against disease and infections.

Oklahoma Girl Strong as Boy

"Louise Alice was fretful, nervous and all run-down from whooping cough," says Mrs. F. J. Kolar, 1730 West 22nd St., Oklahoma City, Okla. "The little I could force her to eat wouldn't ever digest. She became underweight, sallow and weak.

"Then I decided to try California Fig Syrup, and the results surprised me. Her bowels started working immediately, and in little or no time she was eating so she got to be a pest at the table, always asking us to pass things. Her weight increased, her color improved and she began to romp and play again like other children. Now she's the picture of health, and strong as a boy."

Pleasant-tasting, purely vegetable California Fig Syrup acts surely and quickly to cleanse your child's stomach and bowels of the souring waste that is keeping her half-sick, bilious, sallow, feverish, listless, weak and puny. But it's more than a laxative. It tones and strengthens the stomach and bowels so these organs continue to act normally, of their own accord.

Over four million bottles used a year shows its popularity. Ask for it by the full name, "California Fig Syrup," so you'll get the genuine, endorsed by physicians for 50 years.

Weed Fatal to Mosquitoes

Man has a valuable ally in his warfare against the mosquito in a humble aquatic plant that grows in many parts of the United States, says Popular Mechanics Magazine. According to Cornell university scientists, it not only prevents mosquito "wigglers" from growing to maturity but actually kills them. The specific property that makes the plant deadly to the pests has not yet been discovered, and the plant itself is something of a mystery. In some ways it seems to be related to the seaweed family, but in others it stands alone in the plant family, a sort of botanical orphan.

Know Your Cook Book, Girls, Advice of Diva

Margery Maxwell, prima donna with the Chicago Civic and Ravinia opera companies, and who enjoys the distinction of being among the first American girls to be recognized in grand opera circles, takes particular pride in her culinary skill. Cooking, in her estimation, is a fine art which is rapidly being lost.

Margery Maxwell.

"Doubtless one of the big reasons for this condition is that modern young men don't expect the girls they marry to know much about cooking," said Miss Maxwell.

"In the future, before man pops the question, he's going to find out whether the girl knows what calories are and whether she's wise to the elements of a balanced diet.

"A few questions before the minister asks, 'Do you take this woman?' would save a thousand recriminations later."

There are certain dishes to which Miss Maxwell is partial. As she explains them, they are readily prepared. Miss Maxwell uses for Maryland Chicken.

Two 2½ lb. chickens (broilers)
Salt
Pepper
1 cup evaporated milk diluted with
1 cup water
2 eggs
Fine bread crumbs
Fat
1-3 cup butter
1 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. flour

Dress, clean and cut up chickens. Sprinkle with salt and pepper, dip in crumbs, egg, and crumbs. Place in a well-oiled dripping pan, and bake twenty minutes in a 450-degree F. oven, then reduce the temperataure to 350 degrees F. and cook untill tender, about twenty minutes longer. Baste every ten minutes during cooking with ⅓ cup melted butter. Remove to platter and pour around a cream sauce made of fat in dripping pan, the flour, diluted milk, salt and pepper.

Asparagus en Fri.

6 rounds toast
6 poached eggs
⅓ cup evaporated milk diluted with ⅓ cup water
2 tbsp. butter
2 tbsp. flour
1 tsp. salt
Pepper
½ cup grated cheese

Prepare a white sauce of the butter flour, salt, pepper and diluted milk. Cook the asparagus in boiling salted water. Drain and add to white sauce. Place a poached egg in center of toast. Pour asparagus around the egg and sprinkle grated cheese over top of all. Serve at once. Serves six.

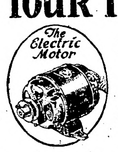
YOUR FARM MAYTAG

Powered with Gasoline or Electricity



The Gasoline Multi-Motor

THERE is but one Maytag—the washer that won world leadership by its faster, cleaner, more careful washing. This wonder washing Maytag is equally practical for farm homes with or without electricity. You have your choice of power—electricity or gasoline.

The Gasoline Multi-Motor

This remarkable Maytag engine is the simplest, sturdiest, most compact gasoline engine made. By removing only four bolts, it is interchangeable with the electric motor. A thrust of the foot pedal starts it. High-grade bronze bearings, a flood-proof carburetor, Bosch high-tension magneto and speed governor make it a worthy Maytag product.

Free for a Week's Washing

Find out how the Maytag will change washday for you. See how the Roller Water Remover, with a flexible top roll and a hard bottom roll, wrings everything evenly dry and spares the buttons. Write or telephone for a Maytag before next washday. If it doesn't sell itself, don't keep it.

The Biggest Little Paper In Marshall County

HOLT WEEKLY NEWS

Issued Weekly From The Home Of The Biggest Co-operative Creamery In Marshall County

One Dollar Fifty Per Year In Advance

H. O. Hanson, Publisher. Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota; Friday, January 25, 1929. Volume 18; Number 39.

Rienhart Rux

Rienhart Theodore Rux was born January 6th, 1907 in Excel Township, Marshall county. He was baptized by Rev. Seltz of Thief River Falls. His bayhood has been spent to a great extent in and around the vicinity of Holt. In his early years he attended the public schools in Holt and even towards the end of his short life he was a frequent visitor to this place.

Between intervals however he was a worker on North Dakota farms. Some days ago he bebecame sick with appedicitis and was taken to Warren and the doctors there operated on him successfully. But God's will was otherwise and as a result he passed on into eternity on Saturday, January 19. This was brought on thru the weakness of his heart.

At the time of his death he was 22 years and 13 days old.

He leaves to mourn his loss a sorowing mother Mrs. Wilhelmine Rux of Northwood, N. D., and three sisters and four brothers namely: Arno Bornstine of Thief River Falls, Herman Rux of Minneapolis, Louise Kulseth of Thief River Falls; Willie Rux of Holt, Rudolpn Rux of Thief River Falls, Minnie Hagen of Tacoma, Washington and Elsie Hart of Northwood, N. Dak.

All were present at the funeral held here on Wednesday from the Lutheran church with Rev. L. M. Redal officiating.

May God comfort the sorrowing mother and her children in the loss which they have experienced, a loss all the greater thru the youthfullness of the deceased.

A. L. Carlson is spending the week at St. Hilaire taking inventory at their store there. Last week he took inventory at their store at Gatzke and the home store here. John Eastby of Greenbush is assisting with the work. Next week they will go to Middle River and Greenbush.

Mr. Carlson, who is secretary of the Carlson Mercantile Company Incorporated, operating five up-to-date stores in Roseau, Marshall and Pennington county, stated that it takes about three weeks for two men to takk the inventory and figure up the accounts of the company.

Wells and America

Mr. H. G. Wells made a survey of the United States a number of years ago. In the book, The Future in America, which he published as the result of his research, he asked: "Is the average citizen honest? Is he a rascal in humbug and grain? If he is, the future can needs be no more than a monstrous social disorganization in the face of divine opportunities." Whatever the future may have in store for us, Mr. Wells' phrase is a good description of large portions of the past as seen with Tammany Hall as a focus.—M. R. Werner in Tammany Hall.

Brown, General Traffic Manager, G. N. Ry., Fred Parker, A. G. F. A., G. N. Ry.

St. Paul, Minn.—In an interview, Mr. M. W. Ellis, president of Hart-Parr company said:

"This present trainload of Hart-Parr tractors worth $200,000 consigned to the farmers of Montana is but one of a score of such trainloads going out to the farmers of the United States and Canada this winter from our factory. During 1929 the Hart-Parr company will transfer through the Twin Cities more than six million dollars worth of farm tractors, every car of which will aid the farmers of the Northwest, producing larger crops at lower cost.

"In no part of the country has the recovery been so rapid from the depression period as in Montana and the other northwestern states. With ingenuity and aggressiveness that compares favorably with the revolution of the manufacturing industry, the farmers in the Northwest have adjusted themselves to new times, new conditions and new methods. The motorization of the farms of the Northwest is now in full swing. Hart-Parr company is very proud of the contribution it has made to this end.

"The perfection of the farm tractor and the harvester combine, together with the introduction of the one way disc plow and the rotary hoe, and improved tillage equipment are putting agriculture on a new basis where costs are cut one-quarter, and farmers allowed to take a profit on the markets of the world. In the use of labor-saying equipment the Northwest has always been a leader.

"The tractor industry and agriculture in the Northwest have grown up together."

CONTESTS AND BETTER FARMING

By D. H. OTIS
American Bankers Association

Much interest has been aroused over the country by ton pig litter contests. In a number of instances these litters have even exceeded two tons. If brood sows were developed so as to produce ton litters, it would be possible to obtain from each litter at least 1,500 pounds dressed meat, which would make it possible to cut down the number of brood sows from 9,000,000 to 6,000,000, a saving of 3,000,000 head.

Egg production per hen is today exceedingly low, amounting to only 56 eggs per year. Under the direction of the colleges of agriculture there have been carried on tests with demonstration farms which show it is easily possible to have flocks able to produce an average of 135 eggs per hen, or more than double the present production. If this were done throughout the United States, we could dispense with 239,000,000 hens, and still maintain the present production of eggs.

The importance and significance of quality production in our live stock is well illustrated in some figures taken from Wisconsin, where over 5,000 cows belonging to cow testing associations have made definite records. Results are shown in the following:

No. of Cows	Av. Lbs. Butterfat	Total Cost	Profit
1,111	203	$98.60	$ .33
1,476	250	107.00	16.00
1,226	298	115.00	32.00
747	346	125.00	47.00
333	396	132.00	65.00
122	445	146.00	78.00

It will be noticed that with each increase of about 50 pounds per cow of butterfat, there is an increase of $15 to $18 per cow in net profit.

The 250 pound cow, which produces $16 profit, represents 6 per cent interest on $266. The 445 pound cow producing $78 profit represents 6 per cent interest on $1,300. In other words, one 445 pound cow will produce as much net profit as five 250 pound cows. Any surplus in dairy products can readily be taken care of by simply eliminating unprofitable or low-producing cows.

Mrs. Ole Backlund who has been sick in bed at her home here the past two weeks, was taken to the Physicians hospital at Thief River on Monday.

Mrs. Anna McClary returned home on Saturday from Warren where she has been staying at the Bratrud Clinic with her brother. Victor Johnson.

LESSON 51

INCOME FROM COWS: Patrons of co-operative creameries, not belonging to Cow Testing Associations, can use the creamery as a simple method of keeping records of the cows, especially when settlement is made on a monthly or bi-monthly basit which is practiced with most co-operative creameries.

Divide the number of pounds of butterfat delivered to the creamery during the month by the number of cows milked. This will give the number of pounds of butterfat per cow. An average of 25 pounds butterfat per cow per month is considered good, or a production of 300 pounds of butterfat per cow a year.

In the same way divide the amount of money received from the creamery for butterfat during the month by the number of cows milked for the average income per cow. At present prices of butterfat the income per cow should be from $12 to $15 per cow a month, or around $150 per cow for the year. The beginning of good dairying is in knowing the production and income of the herd.

"A Female Stranger"

IN THE little burial ground of St. Paul's church at Alexandria, Va., there is an inscription on a monument that never fails to attract the interest of alert passers-by. What's more, the identity of the woman whose resting place it marks has eluded all attempts to solve the mystery for more than a century of time. It reads—

"To The Memory of A
whose mortal sufferings terminated on the fourth day of October, 1816—aged 25 years and 8 months. This stone is erected by her disconsolate husband in whose arms she breathed out her last sigh, and who, under God, did his utmost to soothe the dull, cold ear of death."

It appears that a brig, en route from Halifax to the West Indies, put this couple ashore on July 25; that they secured hotel and physician service; that the woman's face was kept heavily veiled, despite the hot weather; that two hotel guests only were permitted by the man to help him care for her and they only after being sworn to secrecy concerning what they might learn; that he prepared her body for burial, ordered the stone marker with the above description and disappeared after the funeral; that annually for some years he returned and inspected the grave and then his visits ended.

Many years later, as the story goes, an elderly man and woman appeared, ordered the stone replaced by a more costly monument and the following verse added:

How loved, how honored once, avails thee not—
To whom related or by whom begot;
A heap of dust alone remains of thee;
'Tis all thou art, and all the proud shall be.

Then, they too, disappeared, leaving the identity of "The Female Stranger" forever shrouded in mystery.

THE STORY

Influenced by loneliness, in Chicago, Lolita Forbes, young and pretty, yields to the importunities of Harvey Torrence, with whom she fancies herself in love. She discovers his true character and leaves him, taking refuge with an acquaintance, Gertrude Watson. Lolita is accosted by the son of the wealthy owner of the apartments, Fred Watterson. He insists on driving her to the store. On the street Torrence is waiting. He puts the worst construction on Lolita's being with Watterson, and the two men engage in a fistic battle in which Torrence is killed. Lolita spends a night of misery in a police cell. She informs her father, by wire, of her situation, but he answers that he "never wants to see her face again." Next morning the judge, at the instigation of a lawyer, a stranger to Lolita, dismisses the case. The lawyer gives her $200 and an unsigned note informing her that college tuition has been paid for a year. He refuses to give the name of her benefactor. She takes up short story writing and meets Mr. Warrill. Lolita writes a short story which Mr. Warrill praises highly. Miss Pringle, a member of the class, harshly criticises it. The story is sold for $350. Miss Pringle discloses Lolita's real identity. Discouraged, Lolita decides to give up the struggle and sets out for a cafe.

"Like all good medicine," he said, "it's a little hard to take, but, oh boy, it will fix you up fine. Me! I'm going to get liquored up a little, if you don't mind." He tossed off his gin without so much as a wry face and ordered more.

"Now," he announced, "we're going to get acquainted. Me—my name's Lawrence Stallings. I live at home, with my fairly well-off but not particularly honest parents; you've heard of my dad, he runs Stallings restaurant—biggest and bummest restaurant in the loop, the only restaurant in town where I can't get liquor. I was just driving around looking for a playmate when I spotted you tonight; I'm pleased to meetcha—don't mention it." Lolita smiled in spite of herself. He was gay and jolly, though she, deep down, didn't quite approve of him. At any rate, he looked wholly harmless.

"Me," she began, imitating his diction, "my name's Margaret Farrar; I'm a writer; I live all by my lonesome. I was out for a walk when I heard your extremely nervy hail and came along with you, and I'm a little sorry I did already, because if you drink very much more of the gin you'll probably overturn the car in a ditch going home."

"Thank's for the buggy ride," commented the youth, tossing off another glass of gin, and nodding for her to finish hers, which she promptly did. "There's only one thing that I like better than gin, and if you don't want to get dumped into a ditch on the way home, you better lure me away from the gin with a little loving."

"Loving?" laughed Lolita, "don't be silly; why, I don't know you at all." However, she was not particularly offended at what he had said. What difference did it make, after all? And besides, the gin was beginning to make her feel peculiarly happy and carefree. She rose at his nod to dance; and it seemed to her that in all of her life she had never enjoyed a dance so much before. He held her so tightly that the breath was almost squeezed out of her, but she rather liked it; that is, until suddenly she saw a familiar figure emerge from a door on the other side of the room, look about carelessly, and then suddenly spot her. As the calm gray eyes of the man who had been mysteriously caring for her met hers she felt suddenly sobered. There was something positively frightening in them.

He swung about on his heel, made one or two swift motions with his hands and turned back through the door out of which he had emerged a moment before. Almost immediately three or four rough-looking characters followed him through the door.

Lolita decided to say nothing about the incident to Lawrence. He led her back to their table.

"You're a dancing fool," he told her with evident intent to flatter; "tell me can you love like you can dance; or would you rather take a turn at the roulette wheels downstairs first?"

"I think that what we had better do [illegible] at once," she told him anxiously.

"There you go, worrying again. Holy smokes, what's the matter with you? I tell you, you positively don't drink enough, and that's all there is to it." He called over the waiter to remedy this defect in her character. At the same time he tugged at the waiter's coat and pulled him over to whisper into his ear. The waiter nodded. Lawrence rose.

"Come on," he said crisply, "I guess we better get out of all this noise; maybe that's what upsets you. He's going to get us a quiet table upstairs." With misgivings that she swept aside with the thought that nothing mattered anyway, Lolita followed him upstairs. The waiter led the way out upon what appeared at first glance to be a large second-story porch, but Lolita saw at once that it was partitioned off into little sections which opened out into large trees that grew all about the house, but was shut off from the rest of the house by a door which the waiter closed after he had brought two more little opaque glasses of liquid fire and withdrawn. Lolita walked to the window and stood looking out into the calm trees with the moon above them. She thought of her father, of Mr. Warrill, of the girl friends she had had down in Elgin. Suddenly she felt tears starting. She wanted so much some one who would care for her, man or woman; some one to whom she mattered in some way, shape, manner or form, and there was no one! Suddenly, however, she found herself held tightly in Lawrence's arms. For a moment she lay against his shoulder, grateful for even this specious solicitude; and then he made a daring move which sent anger into her veins like molten fire. She struck out at him with all her might, but he was surprisingly strong. Completely sobered by the knowledge of his intentions, so pointedly demonstrated, she fought like a young tigress, every atom of her being instinctively loathing and fearing the youth now. It seemed too late for the realization to do any good, but she did very definitely have the consciousness that however much she might believe that she did not care what happened to her, and how far she went along the wrong path, she did, as a matter of fact, care a whole lot. She would have given anything in the world to be back safely in her room alone. She could feel her strength failing and knew that in a moment the battle would be over, and that she would have lost. Lawrence, feeling her weaken, clasped both arms about her, outside of her own arms, holding her completely helpless, and pressing his lips down upon her own in a wet kiss that sent a perfect nausea of revulsion through her. She struggled again to free herself, but he picked her up bodily and was carrying her across the room when out of the dark a gruff voice sounded:

"Put her down," was all that the voice said, but its timbre was such that even the half-intoxicated youth obeyed instantly.

Again, almost immediately, Lolita heard that horrible sound, so like an apple being thrown up against a brick wall, which had presaged Harvey's death. She slumped to the floor and would have fainted if a strong arm had not suddenly grasped her. She saw now, by the dim light of the moon, that there were three or four men in the porch alcove. They stood stolidly purposeful, like black wraiths.

"Don't kill him; oh, please don't kill him!" Lolita begged, mindful of what had followed a former occurrence of this kind.

"He's just out," said a gruff voice in a kindly manner that heartened her. "Come around in a minute or two."

"Can you walk now?" asked the man who was holding her.

Lolita stood up and took a step forward. Almost immediately the door opened and the light from the hall shone out. For just a fleeting moment she caught a glimpse of the familiar form of the man with the gray eyes in the hall and then he vanished down a stairway. Without a word she walked along between two of the men, each of whom held one of her arms, while another walked before them and another behind. Down through the house and out a back door they took her, finally leading her to a large, black touring car and assisting her into it. Without a word two of the men climbed into the front seat, and two more into the back seat, one on each side of her. The car started with a jerk and soon was flying back toward town at a frightening rate of speed. Not a word was spoken by any of the men, all of whom wore caps pulled down low over their eyes. At last she turned to the one upon her right:

"Are you sure that you didn't kill that young man?"

Both of the men laughed throatily.

"Kill him! H—l! Takes more than a poke in the jaw to kill a guy. He's probably behind us in the road by this time."

"Who is that gray-eyed man who sent you to take me home?"

There was no reply to this.

"Please," she insisted, turning to the man on her left "I want very much to know."

Still no reply.

For several minutes she plied them with questions bearing upon this subject, but not a word would either one of the them say: they sat like Indians, staring out at the side of the road as though they were totally unaware that she was in the car.

Presently the sound of racing engines behind them attracted the men's attention. The man at her right called out an order to the driver and the car slowed down from its terrific pace of sixty miles an hour or more. Almost immediately two motor cycles, each with a uniformed policeman upon it, came up on both sides of the car. The car stopped and one of the officers approached it, while the other remained behind with, as Lolita could see when she looked through the rear glass, a drawn revolver in his hand. She was frightened to death; but no sooner had the officer who had dismounted walked over to the driver than he turned, called out to the officer behind the car, "They're Charlie's men," and promptly drove off.

The car started again, gradually working up a speed even more breathtaking than before. In an incredibly short space of time, Lolita found the car stopping before the building in which she roomed. Without saying a word to her, one of the men took her arm, led her to the door, waited while she opened it with her key, tipped his hat and was gone. From the one glance she got at his face with the light from the hall upon it she knew that he was the kind of man whom she would instinctively have walked around several blocks to avoid. His face was the sort which can only be properly described by the adjective hard and his eyes were almost murderously cold and unsympathetic and yet such men had rescued her. The wonder of it so occupied her mind as she walked up the stairs to the second floor that she almost stumbled over Warrill's feet, where he was sitting asleep in a hall chair.

Warrill rose unsteadily to his feet. Probably Lolita had never presented such a perfect picture of youth and beauty in her life. She had taken off her hat and was carrying it in her hand. Her bobbed hair caught the light burnished gold recesses. Her cheeks were flushed from the effects of the gin and the evening's excitement. She looked a little frightened, softly feminine and tremendously appealing, but Warrill frowned at her.

"I'm sorry, Miss Farrar, if I'm intruding, but I'm worried about your sister. A quite terrible thing happened in class today and I'm afraid she's done something desperate. I decided to stay here until she came back, or until you came back; I guess the lady of the house thought that I had gone out. There doesn't seem to be anybody around. I sat down here to wait and went to sleep." He spoke in a very low tone. Thoughtfully Lolita motioned for him to follow her. Entering her room she was careful to turn on nothing but a little reading lamp that just barely lighted the room. Closing the door softly she turned to him:

"My name," she said steadily, watching him and wondering what had become of the glow of admiration for her beauty that she had seen in his eyes earlier in the evening, "is not Farrar; it is Forbes. My sister's name is Forbes, too."

"So I was told this afternoon. She had been attending a class of mine, but that doesn't make any difference, one way or another. The important thing is: What has become of her? Where can she be at this hour of the night?" Mischievously Lolita carried on her deception.

Real Tribute Wrung From August Belmont

It happened, according to a current story, that reporters were besieging the late August Belmont in a New York hotel relative to a large business deal.

This contest to get Mr. Belmont to talk went through a long day, without results. Finally, after dinner, one reporter determined to try again. He gained admission on the floor reserved for the Belmont party. He banged on one of the doors to the suite.

August Belmont came to the door.

"You fellows have been trying to get me all day," he snapped. "You have been trying to ask a lot of questions, but before I give you any answers let me ask you one question myself. Why, in the name of all that is good and holy, do the newspapers garner all the persistent young men? I hire college men, the best I can obtain, but I rarely find such persistence as is exhibited by you newspaper men. You are on the job until you get what you want. You use brains and the best part of the time you get successful results."—Thrift Magazine.

Forged Cameos

Hundreds of treasured cameos and intaglios, for which large sums have been paid, are spurious, although many of them are masterpieces of art. To such an extent have cameos been forged that, after a certain French count had spent $25,000 in forming a collection, so many forgeries were found among them that, in despair of separating the false from the true, he parted with the lot for a fraction of what they had cost him.

ATWATER KENT RADIO

"I know that man— that is exactly the way he talks"

SHE was listening to a demonstration of an Atwater Kent. Turning the FULL-VISION Dial from one station to another, suddenly she heard the voice of a friend she had not seen for years. She listened eagerly. It was "exactly the way he talked."

"I'll take the set," she said. "This radio tells the truth."

Anyone can convince himself that Atwater Kent receivers and speakers do give faithful reproduction. Listen to an orchestra and pick out the individual instruments. Each has its own character—its own identity.

Turn to a male quartet, a piano solo, a radio drama with all the varying voices and inflections—or to the President when he speaks. Every sound is true to the original. That is the standard of Atwater Kent performance.

Atwater Kent gives it to you for less money. Less money because Atwater Kent Radio is manufactured in great quantities, making economies of production possible. Yet this huge output does not affect quality in the slightest. For every set, besides being made of the finest materials, has to pass 222 tests or inspections in the course of manufacture.

Turn the FULL-VISION Dial and listen to "the radio that tells the truth."

"Telegrams" by Radio

There are several systems available for facsimile transmission of telegrams by radio. The methods developed by C. Francis Jenkins and the Radio Corporation of America are experimentally used by the Navy department in the exchange of messages and in the reception of weather maps on ships. The Post Office department was the first to transmit and receive telegrams by radio in facsimile.

Cat Problem

"One cigar contains enough nicotine to kill twenty cats."

"But how can twenty cats smoke one cigar?"

Tale of a Pig's Tail

"There's pig sense for you," asserted J. Schneider of Winsted, Conn., after relating the following pig-apple story:

The pig was confined in a pen of which an apple tree made one of the posts. Investigation of its peculiar actions disclosed that the pig obtained apples which fell close to the outside of the pen by sitting on its haunches with its back against the fence and, passing its tail under the fence, would feel around until it located an apple. The animal would then allow its tail to curl about the apple and would work its body forward, bringing the fruit under the fence into the pen.

For Colds –

How many people you know end their colds with Bayer Aspirin! And how often you've heard of its prompt relief of sore throat or tonsilitis. No wonder millions take it for colds, neuralgia, rheumatism; and the aches and pains that go with them. The wonder is that anyone still worries through a winter without these tablets! They relieve quickly, yet have no effect whatever on the heart. Friends have told you Bayer Aspirin is marvelous; doctors have declared it harmless. Every druggist has it, with proven directions. Why not put it to the test?

Now Using Muddy Water Method for Inoculating

A good many are now using the muddy water method for inoculating; that is, mix your dirt with water until it is smooth and about the consistency of thick cream, and apply it to the seed, stirring well. Probably, a little more dirt might accompany the seed when the seed had been previously treated with a thin glue water. Though inoculating methods are usually successful with sweet clover, they frequently fail with alfalfa, so far as a perfect stand is concerned.

A Useful Baby

A new use has been found for the baby in the modern home. In one Indianapolis family the new baby and the new radio set came to the home about the same time.

The baby is awakened at 1 a. m. for its night feeding and the fond father has asked his wife to awaken him at the same time so he can listen in on his radio for the programs that are said to be unusually good at that hour.—Indianapolis News.

Dog Attended Funeral

Quite recently a terrier followed his master's funeral to the parish church. He had been found by his owner half starved and had become a great pet and his constant companion. When he was refused admission to the church he showed his teeth and was allowed to enter. After attending the service the dog placed himself between the clergyman and the coffin and walked to the cemetery.—London Answers.

Cameroon Giant Frog

The largest of the family is probably the Cameroon giant frog, which is quite 12 inches in length. The tigerine, or Indian bull-frog, on the other hand, is a bare 6 inches, but it has one noticeable peculiarity: when pursued, it is capable of leaping along the surface of the water in a manner similar to when progressing upon land.

On the Tree Top

Plants that perch on tree tops have been discovered in British Guiana. They are air plants of the pineapple family, a flat-joined cactus, and a yellow orchid, and they were found on the top of a fig tree growing in a mass that apparently existed as a parasite until its long roots were able to find the ground.

Unfortunate Fido

Strange duties fall to the lot of humane society agents, and about the strangest was the visit of a Pittsburgh agent to East Liberty, Pa., for the purpose of informing a housewife that the proper way to scrub Fido, the pup, was not to dump him into the electric washer and turn on the juice.

For Delicate Surgery

A "micromanipulator" has been invented in Germany for performing surgical operations and amputations on single cell animals, such as the amoeba. This extremely delicate instrument can operate upon infinitesimal objects.

Scales Count Contents

Scales have been perfected to count, not monetary value, but the number of small parts, such as screws or bolts, in a mass, the number of yards in a bolt of cloth, or the number of gallons of liquid in a container.

Idea From the Orient

The umbrella is a development of the movable canopy used in the Orient from ancient times in ceremonial processions for persons of rank. It was introduced into England from Italy early in the Eighteenth century.

Date to Be Remembered

On September 5, 1774, the first Continental congress and second Colonial congress met in Carpenter's hall, Philadelphia, Pa. All the colonies were represented with the exception of Georgia

Empty of Purpose

"He who rises at morn with no work before him," said Hi Ho, the sage of Chinatown, "passes the day only as one who walks in his sleep."—Washington Star.

Cause of Sea's Coloring

Near the land the Yellow sea is lemon yellow due to mud suspended in the water. This is caused by the inflow of the Hoang-ho and Yangtze rivers.

Light From the Moon

Light travels at the rate of about 186,000 miles a second, so it would take less than two seconds for the light from the moon to reach the earth.

Oldest Christian Church

Complainers Punished

The Taoists of China believe that continually finding fault with the weather is a sin which will be punished in purgatory.

Munich's Fine Library

A Question

Be sure you are right then go ahead. But how does one know whether he is right until he has gone ahead?—Miami Herald.

Wealth's Proper Use

Wealth is to be used only as the instrument of action: not as the representative of civil honors and moral excellence.

Ancient Warehouse

Land Surface of Earth

If the land surface of the earth were divided between the inhabitants, each person would receive about twenty acres.

The Car Is First

Many an old shoe now is half-soled because the car needs new ones.—Cincinnati Enquirer

Correct

THE DAIRY

DAIRY INDUSTRY NEEDS OUTLINED

Three Most Important Factors Are Pointed Out.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

The important factors that need attention in the dairy industry today are: (1) Greater efficiency in production; (2) production of the highest quality in dairy products; and (3) increasing the consumption of dairy products. This is the statement of O. E. Reed, who recently took up his duties as chief of the bureau of dairy industry, United States Department of Agriculture.

"Scientific facts available today in regard to these factors," continued Professor Reed, "are sufficient proof that a program of this kind entered into by the entire dairy industry will stabilize and insure prosperity for those engaged in it.

"The need of more economic and efficient production is quite apparent on every hand," he said. "The dairy farmer must cull out the low producing cows from his herd and build for a greater production for each cow through keeping records of production, by using better sires, and by following the best methods in feeding, breeding and management. The same problems must be considered by the manufacturer and distributor of dairy products.

"The quality of dairy products must be given more consideration. The farmer is responsible for the quality of the product as it comes from the farm. The manufacturer and distributor are responsible from that point on until it reaches the consumer. Dairy products are perishable and the demand for them will depend upon quality.

"The consumption of dairy products has increased to a marked extent during the past few years but in the light of recent investigations, both from the standpoint of the need of milk in the diet and the underconsumption of dairy products in many sections of the country, a considerable increase can yet be made.

"The work of the bureau of dairy industry is designed to add information through research and investigation to help with a program of this kind. The bureau's efforts, together with results of research carried on by all other organizations of the industry will do much to help solve these problems, but this alone is not sufficient to guarantee success in this work. If the entire industry is to reach the highest level of stability and prosperity every branch must cooperate with every other branch in carrying out a program that will meet all needs.

"And no part of the industry," concluded the new chief, "should forget that we need to continue to keep the public informed as to the value of dairy products, the progress being made in the improvement of them and the methods of production. The more we spread information regarding dairying the faster we will improve and the better the market will be."

Feed Dairy Cows Well Balanced Grain Ration

The generally accepted rule for feeding dairy cows is to supply a well balanced grain ration—balanced according to the character of the roughage fed—at the rate of one pound for each four pounds of milk produced by cows yielding milk testing around 3.5 per cent fat, and one pound of grain for each three pounds of milk produced testing close to 4 per cent of fat or more. This general statement should not be considered as a cast-iron rule, but should serve as a guide to definitely ascertain the capacity of each cow and then feed her more or less than these directions call for according to the response made by each individual.

Dairy Notes

Several kinds of lice may be on the same calf but it is the big blue ones that do the damage.

* * *

The numbers of bacteria in milk have little meaning unless the sanitary history of the milk is known.

* * *

The taste of clean milk is sweet and aromatic. The sweetness is due to the milk sugar, while the aromatic taste comes from the fat. Onions, bittersweet, etc., give bad flavors to milk.

* * *

Some calves seem to be free of lice while others in the same pen may be covered. The oily-skinned calves have a natural protection and because of this they fare better than dry-skinned ones.

* * *

One of the most common mistakes made in winter feeding of dairy cows is failure to provide enough feed. The cow may be looked upon as a milk factory, and as in any other manufacturing plant, the cheapest production is possible only when the plant is run nearly to full capacity.

VERIFICATION OF CURRENT TAX COLLECTIONS BY BOARD OF AUDIT

To the Honorable Board of County Commissioners,

SAME PRESCRIPTION HE WROTE IN 1892

When Dr. Caldwell started to practice medicine, back in 1875, the needs for a laxative were not as great as today. People lived normal lives, ate plain, wholesome food, and got plenty of fresh air. But even that early there were drastic physics and purges for the relief of constipation which Dr. Caldwell did not believe were good for human beings.

The prescription for constipation that he used early in his practice, and which he put in drug stores in 1892 under the name of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, is a liquid vegetable remedy, intended for women, children and elderly people, and they need just such a mild, safe bowel stimulant.

This prescription has proven its worth and is now the largest selling liquid laxative. It has won the confidence of people who needed it to get relief from headaches, biliousness, flatulence, indigestion, loss of appetite and sleep, bad breath, dyspepsia, colds, fevers. At your druggist, or write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. BB, Monticello, Illinois, for free trial bottle.

Sunlight in Every Light

Fundamental studies in biophysics indicate that sunlight has definite effect on tissue specialization and may bear some relationship to nervous stability.

Major prophets in this field predict a future when the sunlight—the ultraviolet rays lost to man when he came indoors—will glow from every incandescent bulb. They predict a brown-skinned race of men with a much more stable nervous system, less given to emotional upsets and thereby less susceptible to the degenerative diseases.—Morris Fishbein in the Yale Review.

What Will you do When your Children Cry for It

There is hardly a household that hasn't heard of Castoria! At least five million homes are never without it. If there are children in your family, there's almost daily need of its comfort. And any night may find you very thankful there's a bottle in the house. Just a few drops, and that colic or constipation is relieved; or diarrhea checked. A vegetable product; a baby remedy meant for young folks. Castoria is about the only thing you have ever heard doctors advise giving to infants. Stronger medicines are dangerous to a tiny baby, however harmless they may be to grown-ups. Good old Castoria! Remember the name, and remember to buy it. It may spare you a sleepless, anxious night. It is always ready, always safe to use; in emergencies, or for everyday ailments. Any hour of the day or night that Baby becomes fretful, or restless. Castoria was never more popular with mothers than it is today. Every druggist has it.

Have Kidneys Examined By Your Doctor

Take Salts to Wash Kidneys if Back Pains You or Bladder Bothers

Flush your kidneys by drinking a quart of water each day, also take salts occasionally, says a noted authority, who tells us that too much rich food forms acids which almost paralyze the kidneys in their efforts to expel it from the blood. They become sluggish and weaken; then you may suffer with a dull misery in the kidney region, sharp pains in the back or sick headache, dizziness, your stomach sours, tongue is coated, and when the weather is bad you have rheumatic twinges. The urine gets cloudy, full of sediment, the channels often get sore and irritated, obliging you to seek relief two or three times during the night.

To help neutralize these irritating acids, to help cleanse the kidneys and flush off the body's urinous waste, get four ounces of Jad Salts from any pharmacy here; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days, and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush and stimulate sluggish kidneys; also to neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer irritate, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

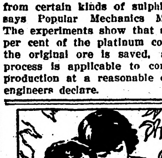
New Platinum Source

Metal experts in South Africa have announced the development of a process for the extraction of platinum from certain kinds of sulphide ores, says Popular Mechanics Magazine. The experiments show that about 75 per cent of the platinum content of the original ore is saved, and the process is applicable to commercial production at a reasonable cost, the engineers declare.



A Sour Stomach

In the same time it takes a dose of soda to bring a little temporary relief of gas and sour stomach, Phillips Milk of Magnesia has acidity completely checked, and the digestive organs all tranquilized. Once you have tried this form of relief you will cease to worry about your diet and experience a new freedom in eating.

This pleasant preparation is just as good for children, too. Use it whenever coated tongue or fetid breath signals need of a sweetener. Physicians will tell you that every spoonful of Phillips Milk of Magnesia neutralizes many times its volume in acid. Get the genuine, the name Phillips is important. Imitations do not act the same!

Receipt for Stolen Ruler Asked in Ad

Moscow.—A thief has been appealed to through an advertisement in Izvestia here to send a "receipt" for an accounting ruler stolen some time ago. The "ad" follows:

"THIEF who stole at house number 126, Leningrad Road, in June, 1928, a Wichman accounting ruler, belonging to Dreyer, a student of the Moscow Technical Institute, is begged to send a receipt to the following address: Moscow, Garahovskaya st. 16. The Trade Union Committee refuses to give me a new ruler without such receipt."

HIRES YOUTH TO PEN SUICIDE NOTE

Newark, N. J.—Mrs. Ernestine Maser, thirty-eight, of No. 864 Fairmount avenue, Newark, could not write. When her husband, John, came home from work one night he found her dead, a gas tube in her mouth. Near her lay a pen-written will. The police were puzzled as to how a woman who could not write could have left a suicide note with her name signed to it.

After questioning 85 persons living in the neighborhood, the police learned from Peter Anselmo, twelve, of No. 353 Fairmount avenue, that he had written the note.

"I thought she was just making a will," the lad said. Mrs. Maser's note said:

"Give all my property to my two younger children; do not leave my husband or my oldest daughter see my body. ERNESTINE MASER."

Peter went over to the Maser house after coming home from school to play with Charles Maser, seven. He said Mrs. Maser sent Charles out to play, telling him to stop running in and out bothering her. She asked Peter to write for her.

She criticized his penmanship, and tore up several uncompleted notes. He had trouble especially with her first name "Ernestine," which she wished written with the utmost neatness.

When he at last made a satisfactory draft, he said, Mrs. Maser gave him a quarter and bade him flippantly to run along and spend it.

The will is worthless, as it was not properly witnessed.

Woman Wrecks Bank to Gain Male Attention

Berlin.—Because no man courted her, thirty-eight-year-old Marianne Waldmann, daughter of a prominent patrician banker of Freiburg, in Silesia, bankrupted her father's bank and had him jailed, until she herself was arrested as a forger.

Since the war Germany has 2,000,000 more women than men. Marianne determined not to live without masculine attention. She showered all the men she met with presents, such as a house full of furniture, motor cycles, wine, and Persian rugs. She paid for these gifts with money from her father's bank, which she was running for him. She presented her father regularly with favorable balance sheets until the Saturday the bank failed.

Marianne denounced her seventy-year-old father as a fraudulent banker, though for his whole life he was the most respected citizen of Freiburg. He was arrested and placed in jail, until the police discovered that his daughter was the defaulter.

Watch Lost 24 Years Recovered in Pawnshop

St. Paul.—Lost 24 years ago, a $400 diamond studded gold watch was back in the possession of its owner here and William Conway, pawnshop inspector, was hailed by his mates as the "man with the memory of an elephant."

Miss Eloise L. Callhan, now a business woman, lost the valuable little timepiece while on an excursion down the Mississippi river in 1904. She at once reported her loss to police, but after a fruitless search the watch was forgotten by all save Conway.

The inspector while on his regular rounds of the pawnshops observed in the showcase of J. S. Samuelson a woman's watch with a diamond crescent on the back. He consulted his record book and confirmed his conviction that it was the watch lost 24 years before by Miss Callhan.

Little Spaniel Saves Mistress From Kidnaper

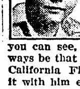
The girl was walking along a highway near the edge of the city when an automobile stopped and a man asked her a direction. Pretending he was deaf, the motorist motioned the girl closed to the car and when she responded seized her and started dragging her into the machine. The man however, failed to reckon with the spaniel.

In an instant the dog was at the man's throat and continued to battle until the grip which held Helen was loosened and the girl was able to run away from the car.

Harold's Mother Knew Answer



"Yes, sir, I am certainly proud of my little boy," says Mrs. H. M. Smith, 421 Topeka Ave., Topeka, Kansas. "He's five and weighs fifty-seven pounds. He's the picture of health as you can see, and I feel like he'll always be that way as long as I can get California Fig Syrup. I have used it with him ever since he was a year old. I knew what to give him for his colds and his feverish, upset spells because Mother used California Fig Syrup with all of us as children. I have used it freely with my boy and he loves it. It always fixes him up, quick."

In many homes, like this, the third and fourth generations are using pure, wholesome California Fig Syrup because it has never failed to do what is expected of it. Nothing so quickly and thoroughly purges a child's system of the souring waste which keeps him cross, feverish, headachy, bilious, half-sick, with coated tongue, bad breath and no appetite or energy as long as it is allowed to remain in the little stomach and bowels. Fig Syrup gives tone and strength to these organs so they continue to act as Nature intends them to do, and helps build up and strengthen weak, pale and underweight children. Over four million bottles used a year shows its popularity. The genuine, endorsed by physicians for 50 years, always bears the word "California."

Ancient Norse Poets

The word "skald" (one of the Norse poets who in primitive times recited long compositions in verse, usually in honor of the great and famous) comes from the old Norse "Skald," meaning "poet." They were minstrels of a high order, often attached to the court. The earliest of these skalds was the mythical "Starkadh, the old." The following are among the most famous of his successors: Thjodolf, author of "Ynglingatal," and Thorbjorn, the minstrel and author of "Haraldsmal." Both of these flourished at the end of the Ninth century at the court of Harold of the Bright Hair. In the Tenth century lived the Norwegian skald Eyvind, who sang the exploits of the famous Hakcnarmal, and the Icelander Egil, who gave his name to the Egils Saga. The last of the skalds was Skurla, who died in 1284.

Denotes Concealed Evil

"There is something rotten in Denmark," is said of a concealed evil. Thousands of persons use this saying continually without having the least suspicion as to its source. It is based on a passage in Shakespeare's "Hamlet." In the fourth scene of the first act of that play Marcellus, an officer of the watch, says to Hamlet's friend Horatio: "Something is rotten in the state of Denmark." The remark was made after Hamlet followed the ghost of his father from the platform before the castle.

Sign Language Weddings

The first double wedding of its kind was celebrated at Allentown, Pa., when four deaf mutes were married. The officiating clergyman was assisted by Edward W. Karcher, a senior at the Lutheran seminary at Mount Airy, who on his graduation and ordination will become the first deaf and dumb Lutheran pastor in the United States. All questions and responses at the wedding were in the sign language.

What is said to be the oldest bell-ringing society in existence, the Ancient Society of College Youths, was founded in 1637 and has members throughout the world. Twelve members of this society were recently granted permission to ring on the 12 bells of St. Paul's cathedral (London) a peal of "Stedman Cinques"—a method of ringing composed by Fabian Stedman of Cambridge, England, about 1640.

H. O. Hanson, Publisher. Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota; Friday, February 1, 1929. Volume 18; Number 40.

Local Bank Shows Good Progress

The Marshall County State Bank enjoyed further steady growth during 1928, according to reports submitted at its annual meeting which was held on Jan. 18th. A 8 per cent dividend was declared and another $500.00 was added to the surplus account. Besides this, the sum of $300.00 was used in reducing the book value of the building, and the furniture and fixture account was reduced in the amount of $465.00. The balance of earnings was credited to the Undivided Profit Account and the local bank will now have a Capital, Surplus and Undivided Profits of over $14,000.00, which will mean an additional protection for its depositors.

J. W. Black, Louis Wegge, F. D. Voth, Robert J. Lund and Theo. M. Thronson were elected Directors for 1929. Mr. Thronson of Thief River Falls was elected a Director in place of Mr. F. L. Anderson who has moved to Crookston. Officers were reelected as follows- J. W. Black, President; Louis Wegge, Vice-President; Geo. Gricker, Cashier and Dorothy Fuller, Assistant Cashier.

The Officers and Directors of the local bank wish to thank the people of Holt and community for the cooperation and confidence shown the local institution, which by its growth is considered one of the best banking institutions in this part of the state.

LESSON 52

A PROFITABLE DAIRY HERD: To build up a herd of dairy cows that will make an average production of 300 pounds of butterfat per cow a year, requires carefull attention to three different lines of work—and a man who excells all three can feel that he is a master farmer.

First—The selection of pure bred dairy sires of high quality that will transmit that quality to their daughters. Great cows are always the daughters of great sires.

Second—The Growing of Feeds: Many a man is a good judge of dairy cattle and a good feeder and caretaker, but the best of his income goes to feed stores and he fails financially which is the final test of a man's ability as a farmer.

Third—Care and Feeding: There is an old adage that "The eye of the master fattens the cattle." The successful dairyman must see everything that needs to be done and do it—the kind of feed and care for each individual that will develop strong, vigorous, productive cows, and who will make conditions agreeable and comfortable for both the herd and the workers.

Muir Woods

MUIR Woods is one of the remaining original redwood forests. It occupies a canyon lying between a shoulder of Mount Tamalpais, the sentinel of the Golden Gate, and the Pacific ocean, a short distance north of San Francisco, and has been set aside as a national monument because of its rare beauty as well as to preserve the majestic trees which it contains. The reserve comprises some 500 acres.

Most of these trees are of the giant redwood variety, some of them nearly 300 feet tall, with diameters ranging up to 18 feet, a kind nature having arranged them in family groupings, their bodies acting as pillars, supporting a roof above formed by their joining tops. These tops wave in the wind and echo with the music of the songs of feathered tribes.

Sheltered from the winds off the sea which sometimes damage forests, the canyon becomes a natural haven for some 450-odd varieties of foliage, including an array of ferns which flourish in surprising confusion.

A strikingly unusual feature commands attention. One tree, killed by fire, has no living base to sustain it. After the fire and before the tree starved to death, another tree fell against it, lost its top, gave its sap to the first tree, revived it and thus the two cripples grew into a single healthy tree.

"These trees," 'tis said, "have outlived the marble columns of the Greeks, who modeled their temples to express the glory of the woods. This grove stood when the temples were building, but it was not the fortune of the beauty-loving builders to behold such a grove as this one."

Farmer Meeting: Two Special Exhibit Cars

The Sugar Beet Special Train was so much appreciated by everybody who saw it that arrangements were made to change the exhibits from the four cars into two cars, and show them at other points in the Red River Valley and Northwestern Minnesota.

The cars will make the following schedule in this district. Holt, Thursday, February 14th all afternoon, Strathcona, Feb. 15 Middle River, Feb. 18th, Thief River Falls, Feb. 20th, and also at all the other towns between Crookston and Warroad.

Farmers' meetings will be held at 1 o'clock p. m., each day, to discuss crop rotation, soil fertility, and cultivation, livestock principally sheep and dairy cows, alfalfa, clover and feed crops. Discussion will be led by J. W. Taylor, County Agent, and D. E. Willard, and Paul C. Wagner, Agricultural Development Agent of the Great Northern.

Exhibits in the cars show the value of rotation of crops and especially rotation of sweet clover and cultivated crops with grain. Sample bundles of grain are shown that were grown on fields where no systemetic plan of rotation had been followed but grain followed grain for many years. The bundles easily show the low yield that is produced and the weeds that are harvested with the grain. Other bundles beside these were taken from the clean fields and in addition to being free from weeds, the grain is of fine quality and made a high yield.

Samples of soil are shown from fields where sweet clover was grown to show how it goes deep into the subsoil and how the roots oped the soil and enrich it. Roots of clover plants were dug out to show the amount of roots that decay and add humus to the soil. These soil exhibits were found very interesting by almost everyone.

One car shows sheep and dairy cattle exhibits and features sweet clover, other clover and alfalfa in rotation for sheep and cattle. There is a pile of alfalfa hay that would be fed to a cow to produce a pail of milk and another pile about three times as large of prairie hay that would be required to make as much milk.

The "Clean up squad" is the title of the principal sheep exhibit. It shows sheep turning stubble fields and sweet clover pasture into profit by wool and lambs.

Carp Are Veterans

It is claimed that there are carp in ponds in Europe two hundred years old. Authorities claim that a carp twenty years of age should weigh around 40 pounds to 50 pounds.

Apply Now For 1929 Auto Tags

Applications for 1929 auto licenses are coming in slowly, according to reports from the state capitol. Perhaps people think that since the legislature is in session, the time will be extended. That is not likely to happen, is indicated by past records. In 1923 an extension was granted, but in 1925 and 1927 time extensions were refused, and the car owners who waited for an extension got their application in late and had to pay a penalty.

Perhaps some think the rate will be reduced. With the demand for more road funds to meet the demands of heavier traffic, this also is not likely to be done. If the rate is either increased or decreased, the change will not take effect until Jan. 1st 1930.

The last day for making applications without paying penalty is February 15, but those who wait until the last week usually have a long wait standing in line if they make personal application. If application is made by mail, and the amount of money enclosed is too small, or if the application is not complete, this starts correspondence which may run beyond Feb. 15 and pile up penalties.

Feb. 15 will soon be here, and those who want to be safe are advised to get their applications in soon. In towns where the secretary of state has no deputy, banks and garages genrally have application blanks.

NOTICE!

The Holt Commercial Club will meet at the bank Monday evening, Feb. 4th at 8 p. m. All of the members are asked to come as there is some important business to be transacted.

No harm done, for Castoria is a baby remedy, meant for babies. Perfectly safe to give the youngest infant; you have the doctors' word for that! It is a vegetable product and you could use it every day. But it's in an emergency that Castoria means most. Some night when constipation must be relieved—or colic pains—or other suffering. Never be without it; some mothers keep an extra bottle, unopened, to make sure there will always be Castoria in the house. It is effective for older children, too; read the book that comes with it.

FRENCH DEED PLOT FOR YANK'S GRAVE

Village Where Hero Died Ends Controversy.

Washington.—Through the gift of the French village of Moyenmoutier of the ground occupied by the grave of Lieut. Thomas R. Plummer of New Bedford, Mass., a controversy of ten years comes to an end.

Unlike most American families whose sons fell in France, the Plummers strongly desired that Lieutenant Plummer's body be left in the little French cemetery where it was buried two days before the armistice was signed and a few days before the Croix de Guerre awarded him by the French government was received.

This caused the unwinding of much red tape. Lieutenant Plummer, although fifty years of age when the war broke out, enlisted in the American Red Cross and was assigned to the French village of Moyenmoutier, just behind the French lines. There he did such valiant work that he was beloved by the entire population of the village. They buried him with highest honors in their own village cemetery. His death was the result of unselfish devotion to sick and wounded French soldiers.

When the work of removing American soldiers' bodies to government cemeteries in this country and France began Lieutenant Plummer's grave was one of the few isolated ones marked "Do not disturb."

The government could not leave soldier's bodies without definite title to the land or without assurance that graves would be properly cared for, however.

After much interchange of correspondence between the town council of Moyenmoutier, the cemetery division of the quartermaster corps of the United States army and the family of Lieutenant Plummer, the problem was solved with receipt of the title to the ground occupied by the grave.

65-Mile View Unfolds to Plane Passengers

Washington.—Airplane passengers who get "a bird's-eye view" of the country as they fly from city to city really get more than a real bird's-eye view.

Passengers in the air liner flying at a height of 2,500 feet, an average altitude for safe flying of big planes, see the horizon 65 miles distant on a clear day and have an area of 7,000 square miles within their vision.

Within an angle of 45 degrees straight down, air passengers with fair vision can survey an area of about 10,000,000 square feet.

Traveling at the usual mail-passenger plane speed of 100 miles an hour, the aerial traveler has less than a minute to decipher signs which have an area of 500 to 2,000 square feet.

The billboard promoters of the future will have to provide giant letters on the roofs of buildings if they expect to "hide America behind the nation's billboards." A six-foot letter is legible at 5,000 feet and a 15-foot letter at 13,000 feet.

"Old Timer" Found Who Was Not With Custer

Arrowhead Springs, Calif.—Although there may be no appreciable diminishing in the number of picturesque old claimants to being the "sole white survivor of the Custer massacre," there is at least one prominent figure of frontier days whose bid for fame includes the boast he was not with Custer.

"Old Bill" Bachtell, veteran of the Confederate army at Antietam and Gettysburg, explains further that his longevity is due, not to the years he has spent in the open air, but to the fact that he deserted the Custer command.

"I came West for excitement," Bachtell relates, "and joined Custer, but everything was so quiet that one night I packed my horse and left. Just a week later Sitting Bull and his warriors wiped out the entire command."

Born in Virginia, "Old Bill" after the Civil war prospected for oil with Grand Duke Alexis, uncle of the late czar; rode with "Buffalo Bill" Cody, and hunted gold with Collis P. Huntington.

Sense of Humor Intact

Orange, N. J.—Sidney M. Colgate, soap magnate, is in a hospital with a leg fracture and his sense of humor. He sent his friends cards bearing a picture of a rocking horse and rider and the words: "A horse is a vain thing for safety." Mr. Colgate was thrown from his mount two months ago.

"Creeping" Driver Free for Lack of Law

New York.—For the first time in the history of the New York Traffic court, a motorist was brought before the magistrate on a charge of driving his car too slowly. The automobilist is Mortimer N. Perkerin, who, Patrolman Quinn of traffic C said, was driving so slowly that his car was an obstruction to traffic.

Although Magistrate Renaud invokes the law against speeding every day, he searched in vain for a statute covering a "creeping" case, and finally discharged Perkerin.

BLISTERS IN EARTH TO ALTER ITS SHAPE

That Is What Noted Scientist Sees for Future.

New York.—The earth's crust probably is not "dead" and finished in shape, the American Association for the Advancement of Science was told by Dr. Bailey Willis of Stanford university.

Instead, even the stable bottom of the Atlantic ocean now may be heating up preparatory to causing land shifts. The theory is that scores of miles down in the rocks that form the skin of mother earth, great blisters form, as big as whole states, and that as they melt the rocks, the resulting upthrusts make the earth's surface what it is, and whatever it may change to.

But there was nothing of possible human catastrophe in Doctor Willis' picture, for he spoke in the new time concept of science, his changes requiring millions of years. He named well known places where on the slow time scale such shifts actually now seem under way.

Great Plateaus of Granite.

Doctor Willis' address inaugurated the annual convention of the association. His subject was "the Origin and Development of Continents." He said all continents are great plateaus of granite, standing high above the sea bottoms, which are of basalt, a heavier rock.

"We know the kind of rock that underlies the sea," he said, "from seismographs. With aid of earthquakes we can sink our plummets more than half way to the center of the earth. We know the velocity at which shocks travel, the depths at which they pass through or around the earth, and the kind of rock they pass through.

"We know that the earth is enveloped about 2,000 miles thick with elastic rock, below which is a core about 2,000 miles in radius, apparently inelastic, very hard, probably iron, which may be melted."

The heat that causes blisters, he said, probably does not emanate from the earth's inner core.

"Compression by gravity," he added, "is capable of producing all the heat of which we have evidence. As rocks heat, the melting tends to extend laterally faster than upward, thus forming blisters—asthenoliths, we call them.

"Conditions favorable to formation of asthenoliths appear likely to develop in those layers thirty to six hundred miles below the earth's surface, and probably only those within less than one hundred miles of the surface directly affect it.

"A blister may grow several hundred miles across, and be ten to twenty miles deep, containing one or more million cubic miles. The cover eventually breaks around the margins, where eruptions follow, and finally the cover falls into the emptied center. Conditions thus theoretically sketched are features of the smaller depressions that are the deeps of the oceans. The Windward and Hawaiian islands are examples of volcanic ridges surrounding such deeps.

Takes Years to Grow.

"A blister requires perhaps several million years to grow. A very large number of eruptions, a great many blisters and an enormous lapse of time must have been required to form Africa, Eurasia and the Americas in this way. The complex structure of each continent corresponds with the multiplicity of actions required by the theory."

Adobe Houses in Old Mine Town Yield Gold

Monterey, Mexico.—T. L. Crawford, a British mining engineer who has arrived here from Mazapil, an old mining town buried in the heart of the mountains, has found that slag from the smelters operated by Spaniards more than 200 years ago, and long abandoned, carries high values in gold.

Even the old adobe houses are rich in the precious metal, according to assays which he made recently. Some of these adobe blocks run as high as $500 to the ton of gold, silver and copper. Mr. Crawford has interested a syndicate of mining men in the possibilities of smelting the slag and the adobe-built houses by modern methods.

School Runs Laboratory to Strengthen Pupils

Lebanon, Tenn.—A human laboratory for experiments designed to develop a stronger boy of preparatory school age is being conducted at the Castle Heights Military academy, located here in the Cumberland foothills.

Every student is required to take part in some branch of athletics. Only black bread is served the cadets. The school prepares its own flour, dairy dishes and vegetables and dietary measures are part of the school training.

City of 11,500 Guarded at Night by One Cop

Derby, Conn.—Because of an error in police department bookkeeping, this city of 11,500 inhabitants is being guarded at night by only one patrolman. Three men were dropped from the force by Chief Thomas Van Etten when he discovered that through an unexpected shortage there would be only money enough to pay one night policeman for the rest of the fiscal year.

WIFE AND EX-WIFE SHARE HAPPY HOME

Both Mother Child in Strange Kansas Family.

Wichita, Kan.—George Dooley of Wichita is the head of a peaceful household consisting of his wife, his former wife, and his five-year-old daughter, Katherine.

When Mrs. Daisy Dooley received her divorce from Dooley the court ruled Katherine should be in the custody of her mother three days out of each five, and with the father the remainder of the time. Dooley remarried, and now all live in the same house.

The two Mrs. Dooleys declare they are not in the least jealous of each other. Katherine receives the loving attentions of both her mother and her stepmother, who co-operated in giving her a merry Christmas day.

When asked which of her mothers she loved most, Katherine replied: "I love both of them. I love my mamma and I love Neva, and I love my daddy lots and lots."

Dooley, who is United States quarantine inspector for this district, said he was very happy over the success of his unusual arrangement.

"You know some people have funny ideas about marriage," he said. "They can't see how a scheme like this will work.

"For five months I was on the Chicago police force and both my present and ex-wife were with me. All of the boys used to wonder how I could manage it. Some declared 'I can't even get along with one woman, how can you live with two?' But I really am happy and so are they."

The present Mrs. Dooley (Neva) explained the situation this way:

"Last October I lost my only child, a little boy. Kitty is taking his place in my life and at the same time filling her mother's heart with joy."

Town Refuses to Move "Column With a Curse"

Augusta, Ga.—Sentiment which for 46 years has allowed "the column with a curse" to stand in the middle of a sidewalk, won out recently when a paving program made practicable the removal of the queer relic of a tornado's fury.

The column, once the pillar of the city market house, has stood at Broad and Center streets ever since a tornado hit Augusta in 1878. Old citizens say that an itinerant minister, claiming the gift of prophecy, predicted that the old market house would be destroyed the day after his sermon. He declared that but one of the big pillars supporting the market house would be left standing and declared that any attempt to move the pillar would be fatal; that the person who tried it would be struck by lightning.

As it happened, a tornado hit this town the next day and only one pillar of the market house was left standing. Some years ago city officials said the pillar would have to be destroyed to permit certain street repairs. A large number of workmen carried the pillar about 50 feet. There was an explosion and they dropped it. And today the pillar stands where the workmen dropped it when some practical joker exploded a firecracker.

Art Is Used by Pastor to Stress His Sermons

Springdale, Pa.—Rev. Charles W. Baker, Jr., pastor of St. Mark's Lutheran church here, illustrates his sermons with charts and sketches he has made himself. In Sunday school and church assemblies he gives chalk talks.

At the altar is a huge mural of Christ in the garden of Gethsemane, a copy of the Michelangelo mural in the Vatican, which the minister has painted. In his church and parsonage Mr. Baker has hung numerous other of his paintings and sketches.

While attending college and the Lutheran seminary at Gettysburg, Pa., Mr. Baker had an advertising sign shop which provided him with funds for his education.

Danville, N. Y.—Becoming a grandfather and great grandfather in a day was the good fortune of C. E. Green of this village.

Child Pasteur Saved Became His Watchman

Paris.—The first child Pasteur succeeded in curing of hydrophobia in 1885 now is principal gatekeeper at the Pasteur Institute laboratories. He is Joseph Meister, an Alsatian.

Meister has grown older and stouter, but he is still known as Little Meister, "le petit Meister," to every one at the institute. He keeps watch at the gate just opposite the building which houses the vault and last resting place of the great scientist who saved his life, the first of so many others.

There's Always Something

Every age and time has discouragements peculiar to itself. Here we are today going along coddling our own discouragements, petting them, and blatantly believing that we, of all people and of all ages, are the only ones visited with such discouraging discouragements. And yet, just a half century ago, our neighbors in an adjoining county were grievously discouraged over the fact that the buffalo hide market in New York had taken a slump.—Mineral Wells (Tex.) Dorothy's Mother Proves Claim

Children don't ordinarily take to medicines but here's one that all of them love. Perhaps it shouldn't be called a medicine at all. It's more like a rich, concentrated food. It's pure, wholesome, sweet to the taste and sweet in your child's little stomach. It builds up and strengthens weak, puny, underweight children, makes them eat heartily, brings the roses back to their cheeks, makes them playful, energetic, full of life. And no bilious, headachy, constipated, feverish, fretful baby or child ever failed to respond to the gentle influence of California Fig Syrup on their little bowels. It starts lazy bowels quick, cleans them out thoroughly, tones and strengthens them so they continue to act normally, of their own accord.

Millions of mothers know about California Fig Syrup from experience. A Western mother, Mrs. J. G. Moore, 119 Cliff Ave., San Antonio, Texas, says: "California Fig Syrup is certainly all that's claimed for it. I have proved that with my little Dorothy. She was a bottle baby and very delicate. Her bowels were weak. I started her on Fig Syrup when she was a few months old and it regulated her, quick. I have used it with her ever since for colds and every little set-back and her wonderful condition tells better than words how it helps."

Don't be imposed on. See that the Fig Syrup you buy bears the name, "California" so you'll get the genuine, famous for 50 years.

No Question About That

The Girl Who Came Back

By Jack Woodford

THE STORY

Influenced by loneliness in Chicago, Lolita Forbes, young and pretty, yields to the importunities of Harvey Torrence, with whom she fancies herself in love. She discovers his true character and leaves him, taking refuge with an acquaintance, Gertrude Watson. Lolita is accosted by the son of the wealthy owner of the apartments, Fred Watterson. He insists on driving her to the store. On the street Torrence is waiting, and the two men engage in a fistic battle in which Torrence is killed. Lolita spends a night of misery in a police cell. She appeals to her father, but he answers that he "never wants to see her again." Next morning the judge, at the instigation of a lawyer, a stranger to Lolita, dismisses the case. The lawyer gives her $200 and an unsigned note informing her that college tuition has been paid for a year. He refuses to give the name of her benefactor. She takes up short story writing and meets Mr. Warrill. Lolita writes a short story which Mr. Warrill praises highly. Miss Pringle, a member of the class, harshly criticizes it. The story is sold for $350. Miss Pringle discloses Lolita's real identity. Discouraged, Lolita decides to give up the struggle and sets out for a cafe. She allows herself to be "picked up" by a youth in an auto, and taken to a roadhouse. There her escort insults her. She is rescued by her unknown friend. Returning to her room she finds Warrill there.

"There is no telling where Lolita Forbes may be at this hour of the night. She is the girl, you remember, who was involved in a very disgraceful scrape over the death of a man named Harvey Torrence not long ago. I'm surprised that you're so concerned over such a girl, a good-looking chap like you." He looked quickly and angrily down at her. Suddenly, standing in the middle of the floor facing her, he seemed to realize for the first time that he was alone in the room with her. He turned as if to go, but she put out a hand swiftly and caught hold of his arm.

"What's your hurry, Mr. Warrill; you've waited this long, you might as well wait until she comes in?" He turned back again irresolutely. "And, anyway," she moved closer to him and smiled up at him archly: "I can't understand why all the concern over Lolita, she's not even good looking." His figure became suddenly rigid; she saw little tight lines form about his mouth as he looked down at her disapprovingly.

"Miss Forbes," he said slowly, "I don't care a whoop what your sister has done, and, as a matter of fact, I more or less agree with you that she's not particularly good looking, but, d—n it all, I love the poor little thing as I've never loved a woman before, and if I can ever find her again—if nothing dreadful's happened to her so that she won't ever come back—I'm going to ask her to marry me the moment that I again see her." Lolita stepped back a pace as though he had struck her, but she still carried on the masquerade, pouted up at him:

"Don't you think that I'm prettier than my sister?"

"You're quite beautiful."

"Then why—" But she could see that her beauty was as nothing to him compared to his evident worry for the safety of the other Lolita who was not beautiful. She stepped close to him, put both hands upon his shoulders, looked up into his eyes:

"Mr. Warrill; I've been fooling you. Each time that you've seen me this evening it's been in a dim light. I am Lolita Forbes, the girl you've known as Margaret Farrar; I am the one who was mixed up in that dreadful affair in the papers; that's why I dyed my hair—all that sort of thing—wore those awful spectacles and dowdy clothes with the long dresses and high collars." He looked swiftly about the room, saw the electric light switch, strode over and pressed it, flooding the room with light. Walking back to the center of the floor, where she awaited him, he looked closely at her and then was instantly convinced. His arms were about her without delay. As she felt his tight embrace it seemed to Lolita that she was melting. A thousand times she had imagined his arms about her, but in her wildest dreams it had never seemed as good as it actually felt now. His kisses rained upon her upturned face, her closed eyes, and finally settled upon her lips with a warm finality that was so delicious that Lolita felt weak and drooped a little. Sensing this, he picked her up as easily as though she were a six-year-old child and sat down with her in a large easy chair, cradling her in his arms. Lolita buried her head upon his shoulder and cried softly. It was all so beautiful. Somehow he made up for everything that she had missed in life.

He sat and held her tightly until she had stopped crying and had pulled a large handkerchief from his pocket and was wiping her eyes upon it. Shyly, hiding her head, afraid to look at him, she spoke softly:

"I've loved you from the first moment that ever I saw you, that day when Miss Marion introduced us."

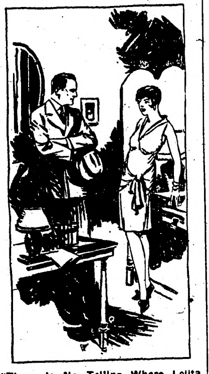
"Did you, dear?" He lifted up her head so that he might look into her eyes. "You poor little thing, I was so afraid that after what happened in class today you had done something desperate. It was when I got to thinking about that that I realized that I loved you."

The words sent a thrill clear down to Lolita's toes; she wriggled ecstatically. "How did you feel when you first realized it?"

"Oh, I don't know how to describe it. I've written the sensation into a hundred stories, thinking that I knew all about it; but I didn't really, nor have I ever read any one else's story that described it exactly."

"But tell me," she begged, breathless with the desire to hear.

"Oh, let me see. Well, first, I felt a sort of chill all over; and then little prickly sensations came on my scalp; and next I was just breathless with fright for fear something had happened to you. I kept seeing you as you looked after that Pringle person told on you and I just ached all over for you, but then, all that doesn't half describe it. It was all just too wonderful for words, that's all there is to it."



"There Is No Telling Where Lolita Forbes May Be at This Hour of the Night."

"And you don't care about all that stuff that was in the newspapers?"

"Not a bit."

"Not even if I were to tell you that part of it was really true?"

"Certainly not; do you think for one minute that I would permit myself to hold anything against any girl, knowing what a devil of a proposition life is, as every writer who studies it at close quarters must. Anyone with an ounce of perception can see that there isn't a modicum of intentional vicious badness in you. The fact that you made one mistake doesn't make any difference at all. In fact, it makes me want to love and protect you all the more. And, besides, I don't believe in all of the 'moral' rights and wrongs that so many people so glibly talk about. I'm not so sure that I am wise enough to calmly point to one thing and say 'that is wrong,' while another thing is right. People who are so sure about 'rights' and 'wrongs' make me supremely sick."

"But suppose I were to tell you that even tonight I had no more moral courage than deliberately to start out to misbehave because things had gone wrong? I'm afraid I'm not as good as you think I am. The fact of the matter is I let a sheik pick me up and take me out to a roadhouse and kiss me—that is, I let him take me out there. I didn't really let him kiss me; he helped himself in spite of all I could do, but I got away from him in time—for which fact no credit is due myself." He looked a little thoughtfully at her for a second, but waved this aside too after a moment, not even stopping to comment upon it as he bent to kiss her again and again.

For a long time they sat without a word as he hugged her closely to him. Suddenly, however, a terrific fear took hold of Lolita. Loving him with all her heart she realized that already she was again at the crossroads where one plain sign pointed to the right and the other to the wrong. He had said nothing, but somehow a subtle change had come over him, and over her. It was almost like a presence in the room. A consciousness of peril, delicious seeming, yet, Lolita knew, fraught with portent. She rose and stood before him, eyes averted. When her words came they were almost a whisper.

"You had better go now."

He rose and stood before her, taking both of her hands.

"Must I?"

"Yes, you—you must; at once, too, please."

"But you told me you loved me?"

"I do."

"Then—?"

"You must go at once."

He caught her in his arms and, bending her back, rained kisses upon her throat, her cheeks and finally her lips.

"No, no, no, no," she said, pushing him from her, "I want you to go—please." Almost violently she pushed him from her. Without another word he turned toward the door; but, at the door he stopped, turned around, smiled warmly.

"Little angel," he said, "don't let yourself think that there's anything bad about you; I was testing you deliberately. You're true blue. If you hadn't asked me to go, it would have broken my heart. I couldn't have stopped loving you; but it would have been—different; not half so beautiful as it is now." With that he opened the door and was gone.

For a long time she stood in the middle of the floor feeling his kisses still upon her, his warm arms about her. Then she sat down before a little enamel dressing table and started removing her clothing. Presently she drew on a pair of silk pajamas and slid in between cool covers. She sighed and hugged her pillow and all at once it came to her that she had somehow changed for the better. How was it that she had ordered him to go, though every ounce of her physical being wished him to stay? It was somehow wonderful because it proved conclusively that she was not as she had a little let herself gradually think she was. A feeling of happy triumph shot through her. For the first time since Harvey Torrence had come into her life she felt good, clean, as though she were really going to be able to live up to her highest ideals in spite of everything.

CHAPTER VII.

The following morning Lolita woke up to find it raining heavily. Ordinarily a gray, rainy morning like this one would have made her feel infinitely sad and blue, but this morning its effect was just the opposite. She enjoyed the steady sound of the rain against the window, even thought that the intermittent "woooooo" of the fog horn at the river's mouth, which she could faintly hear even though she was a long way from it, was friendly and beautiful. Mentally she went all over the events of the night before; and again, so real that she blushed, she could feel Warrill's warm arms around her, feel his lips upon her own. She wondered how soon he would call her up. Perhaps he would come around or send flowers. How perfectly delicious it was to know that one was cared for, wanted by somebody, particularly by the one body in all of the whole wide world that one most wanted to be cared for by!

Presently there was a knock at the door.

"Who is it?" Lolita called out cheerfully.

"It's me," came back the voice of the landlady.

"Come in," Lolita called back.

The door opened and Mrs. Hardy entered. She was a good-natured, happy-go-lucky soul. She had had two husbands, both of whom had died, but she was firmly convinced that the best husband she had ever had would, almost any day, show up and carry her off to an ivory tower. She advanced and sat down upon the edge of the bed and handed Lolita a long envelope with her name printed upon it. Lolita tore it open and a check for ninety dollars was revealed.

"Hot dog!" commented Mrs. Hardy. "Sold another story. You're going to be a big writer some day like Mary Roberts Rinehart, or Fanny Hurst. Gee I wish I had your ability!"

"I should think with your experience, that you could write ten times better stories than I," remarked Lolita.

"That sure was a swell fellow called here to see you last night," Mrs. Howard began enviously.

No Distinctive Flag for Vice Presidents

There is no vice president's flag authorized at the present time. In March, 1915, a vice president's flag was adopted for a special occasion during the illness of President Wilson, when Vice President Marshall visited the U. S. S. Colorado (now the U. S. S. Pueblo) at the opening of the Panama-Pacific exposition in San Francisco. This flag was manufactured by the navy yard, Mare Island, and flown from the main masthead of the Colorado during the stay of Vice President Marshall on board. It consisted of a white flag emblazoned with the arms of the United States, which at that time was similar to the President's flag, which was a blue flag emblazoned with the arms of the United States. At the conclusion of the visit of Vice President Marshall the flag was presented to him. There has only been one other use of a vice president's flag. This was on October 29, 1919, when Vice President Marshall accompanied the king of the Belgians on board the Mayflower for a trip to Mount Vernon. The flag used in this case was the same as that described above.

Aqueducts

An aqueduct is a water conduit, particularly one for supplying a community from a distance. Aqueducts are ordinarily of masonry, arched over and sometimes forming a foot or general transit bridge.

Dr. Constantine Fahlberg and Dr. Ira Remsen discovered coal-tar derivatives in 1879.

Big Trees Saved by Fire-Resisting Bark

The bark of a California big tree is, on large specimens, as much as three feet thick and is almost as resistant to fire as asbestos. A sample of the bark twelve inches square was placed in a lumber mill furnace, surrounded with dry pine and fir wood and burned for eight hours. When taken from the furnace the bark was merely charred on the outside. This resistance to fire is one reason for the longevity of the California big tree, which is known to attain an age of 4,000 years and may reach 6,000 or more. A mature specimen, twenty feet or more in diameter, sustained scores of forest fires in the days before the national parks and forests were protected. Other conifers of the western mountains, notably the sugar pine, yellow pine, red and white fir, also possess thick fire-resisting bark.

Map on Her Back

In the scramble for unique designs for woven fabrics the designer has taken inspiration from the atlas. In Paris recently a woman was seen in a pale silk frock covered with a lightly etched design which was a map of the gay city.

Amid the tracery of the boulevards and avenues with their outstanding features—the Louvre, Notre Dame, Arc de Triomphe and so on—the pale green Seine looped the loop across her back, winding from the city island to the Bois de Boulogne.

Table Used for 400 Years

One of the most famous tables in England is in disuse awaiting repairs after centuries of service. It is the poor pilgrims' table in St. Thomas' hospital, Canterbury.

The table, which stands in the refectory of the hospital, is of oak, and will seat 20 persons. Until recently it was used every day, as it has been for nearly 400 years, by the poor pilgrims who came to Canterbury to visit the shrine of Thomas A. Becket, and who had the right to a free bed and board, and a few pence a day.

Big Penny Business

Buy a cigar and the clerk will throw in a little pack of matches or sell you a box for a cent. That doesn't look as if there was much money in the match business, yet the 18 match factories in the United States did nearly $25,000,000 worth of business last year and paid out more than $4,000,000 in wages. . . . If pennies will do that much it will pay to take care of the dollars.—Capper's Weekly.

FOR COLDS

BAYER

ASPIRIN

To break a cold harmlessly and in a hurry try a Bayer Aspirin tablet. And for headache. The action of Aspirin is very efficient, too, in cases of neuralgia, neuritis, even rheumatism and lumbago! And there's no after effect; doctors give Aspirin to children—often infants. Whenever there's pain, think of Aspirin. The genuine Bayer Aspirin has Bayer on the box and on every tablet. All druggists, with proven directions.

Physicians prescribe Bayer Aspirin; it does NOT affect the heart

Modern Methods

Dr. Spencer Lewis, who is lending a colony to the Nile, where they will settle and live in the antique manner, eschewing all things modern, said to a San Francisco reporter:

"Modern methods weaken and narrow us. The manual laborer who did beautiful work in the past is only a machine minder today. And it's the same with education.

"'Yeh?' said another mother.

"'Yeh. Give her the name of any record, I don't care what it is, and she'll tell you right off the bat what's on the other side.'"

A scheme for uniting all transmission lines into 16 main lines to serve a district of 8,828 square miles is under consideration in England.

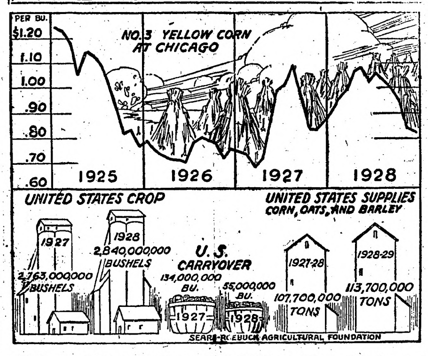
Favorable Corn Market Situation in Spite of Increased Crop



While corn prices are likely to average somewhat lower in 1929 than in 1928, there are numerous favorable factors which will prevent a pronounced decline, says the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. Prices at the close of 1928 were already about 15 per cent below the average for that year. Hence the market probably will hold up quite well during the rest of the winter, but a rise as pronounced as last winter and spring is unlikely to occur.

The increase in the crop harvested last fall was offset by the reduced carryover of old corn, consumption on farms and in commercial channels has been extremely heavy thus far, and substantial exports during the winter are probable. On the other hand, the quality and feeding value of the crop was much better than in 1927, larger supplies of other feed grains are available, and there appears to be some tendency to rush hogs and beef cattle to market to save corn.

The 1928 corn crop, estimated at 2,840,000,000 bushels, with a carryover on farms and in the visible supply of 55,000,000 bushels, made a total supply for the season of 2,895,000,000 bushels. This was about 2,000,000 bushels below the revised estimate of the supply for the preceding season. Of the 1928 crop, 82.9 per cent was of merchantable quality, compared with 75.2 per cent a year earlier and 80.7 per cent the ten-year average. The total supply was about 6,100,000 tons greater than in 1927, or an increase of about 6 per cent.

Consumption and market disappearance of all feed grains in the latter part of 1928 appears to have been considerably larger than in 1927. More cattle were shipped into feeding districts, a good many hogs were carried over to be finished on new corn. Exports of corn were greater than in 1927 and exports of barley were the largest on record. If both the 1927 and 1928 corn crops were correctly estimated, it is probable that the available supply of corn on January 1, 1929, was smaller than a year previous, although reserves of oats and barley probably remain larger than a year ago.

Production of corn in European countries which have reported to date totals 343,000,000 bushels or a decrease of 95,000,000 bushels under the small 1927 crop and 183,000,000 bushels under the average from 1923 to 1927. While more oats and barley were produced in Europe than in 1927, total production of all feed grains decreased slightly. With the Argentine crop surplus approaching exhaustion and a new crop not available until next May, foreign demand for corn from the United States during the winter promises to be the best for several years.

While consumption of new corn and other grains has been heavy thus far, the ratio between prices of hogs and beef cattle on the one hand and corn prices on the other is proving to be less favorable for feeders than expected a few months ago and farmers seem disposed to sell live stock and hold corn. The quality of the crop permits holding with much less danger of spoilage than would have been the case last year. This may mean a weaker situation later when these holdings are marketed, and may prevent such a pronounced rise as occurred from January to May, 1928.

The 1929 corn crop in the United States will not be ready for harvest until late in the year, but it will become a market influence as soon as the new growing season starts, the Foundations adds. Extremely unfavorable weather could make the new crop outlook the most important market factor.

LESSON 53

Farming deals with three lines of business—production—manufacturing—marketing. Production has to do with the production of farm crops, farm animals and animal products. Manufacturing in the business of farming is in the co-operative creamery. Marketing or merchandising is the sale of farm products whether at the corner store or thru a large co-operative marketing association.

Short Lessons in Dairying will deal with each of these lines during the coming year. Each lesson will contain three paragraphs—one on production—one on manufacturing—and one on marketing. They aim to give timely bits of information in a form that can be quickly and easily read.

The success of farming as a business requires attention to the sale of a product as much as production. The price that a product sells for is as important as its yield.

The Keystone State's Capitol

FOR massiveness of construction and outstandingness in its home town, Harrisburg, the impressive capitol of Pennsylvania, ranks high among the beautiful capitols of America. Dedicated in 1906, the cost of building, furnishings and equipment was more than $11,000,000.

A description prepared by the state librarian relates: "The capitol building is 520 feet long, 254 feet wide and 272 feet high. It covers two acres of ground and is half a mile in circumference. It is larger than St. Paul's cathedral, for the building of which Sir Christopher Wrenn was knighted. It is longer than Westminster abbey. The building contains 475 rooms. The dome, which has been called "the heart of the capitol," weighs 52,000,000 pounds. Every country in the world contributed material for the construction and furnishing of the building, and the most famous artists in the world devoted their talents to making it beautiful."

Each of the great main entrance bronze doors were cast in one piece and weigh a ton. The governor's reception room is 72 by 27 feet. The senate chamber is 95 by 80 feet. The house of representatives is larger and even more ornate. The stained-glass windows in both are celebrated examples of the art. The great paintings which ornament both legislative halls have called forth unstinted praise.

In the dome are set the memorable words of Penn, the founder of the state: "There may be room there for such a holy experiment. For the nations want a precedent. And my God will make it the seed of a nation. That an example may be set up to the nations. That we may do the thing that is truly wise and just."

Dairy products and eggs valued at $29,686,214 were exported from the United States in the year ending June 30, 1926, according to a statement on the export situation issued by the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. Canned milk topped the list, with eggs second, cheese third and butter fourth. The principal export market for these products proved to be Cuba, which took two-fifths of the eggs shipped abroad and was next to the United Kingdom as a buyer of canned milk. Great Britain was the second largest customer for these products, with the Philippine Islands in third position. Mexico, Germany, China and Japan, Panama and Canada were the other markets which bought the surpluses of these products.

Los Angeles Boy Needed Help

Leroy Young, 1116 Georgia St., Los Angeles, is a "regular fellow," active in sports, and at the top in his classes at school. To look at him now, you'd think he never had a day's sickness but his mother says: "When Leroy was just a little fellow, we found his stomach and bowels were weak. He kept suffering from constipation. Nothing he ate agreed with him. He was fretful, feverish and puny.

"When we started giving him California Fig Syrup his condition improved quickly. His constipation and biliousness stopped and he has had no more trouble of that kind. I have since used California Fig Syrup with him for colds and upset spells. He likes it because it tastes so good and I like it because it helps him so wonderfully!"

California Fig Syrup has been the trusted standby of mothers for over 50 years. Leading physicians recommend it. It is purely vegetable and works with Nature to regulate, tone and strengthen the stomach and bowels of children so they get full nourishment from their food and waste is eliminated in a normal way. Four million bottles used a year shows how mothers depend on it. Always look for the word "California" on the carton to be sure of getting the genuine.

THE STORY

Influenced by loneliness, in Chicago, Lolita Forbes, young and pretty, yields to the importunities of Harvey Torrence, with whom she fancies herself in love. She discovers his true character and leaves him, taking refuge with an acquaintance, Gertrude Watson. Lolita is accosted by the son of the wealthy owner of the apartments, Fred Watterson. He insists on driving her to the store. On the street Torrence is waiting, and the two men engage in a fistic battle in which Torrence is killed. Lolita spends a night of misery in a police cell. She appeals to her father, but he answers that he "never wants to see her again." Next morning the judge, at the instigation of a lawyer, a stranger to Lolita, dismisses the case. The lawyer gives her $200 and an unsigned note informing her that college tuition has been paid for a year. He refuses to give the name of her benefactor. She takes up short story writing and meets Mr. Warrill. Lolita writes a short story which Mr. Warrill praises highly. Miss Pringle, a member of the class, harshly criticizes it. The story is sold for $350. Miss Pringle discloses Lolita's real identity. Discouraged, Lolita decides to give up the struggle and sets out for a cafe. She allows herself to be "picked-up" by a youth in an auto, and taken to a roadhouse. There her escort insults her. She is rescued by her unknown friend. Returning to her room she finds Warrill there. He tells her he loves her and asks her to marry him. She makes no promises but the avowal heartens Lolita, and she once more resolves to attempt to "come back."

"You liked him?"

"Positively. He's so distinguished looking, and he's got the nicest eyes; and he was so worried about you. Wouldn't leave the house until you had come back; paced around in the halls for hours. He said something about having seen your sister here—I didn't know you had any sister."

"I haven't. I'd decided that people had about forgotten that scrape I got into, and wouldn't remember what I looked like, so I stopped dying my hair and dolled myself up. It was the first time that he had seen me that way and in the half light on the landing I kidded him along a bit."

"You shouldn't ought to of; he was worried to death."

"Well, I told him what I'd done when I got back. He was still here. I—that is, he asked me to marry him."

"Hot diggity-dog; that's slick. Gee, I'm glad to hear that, girlie. You're a darn good kid, and there's no reason why you should be hounded because of that one little scrape you got into. I hope you'll be awfully happy." She sighed heavily.

"I'll bet you'll be getting married yourself before long," Lolita said softly, her heart going out to this somewhat peculiar woman.

"Don't kid yourself—" she sighed again, "I wouldn't marry the best man alive—they're all alike." Lolita laughed.

"What about your gray-eyed friend?" asked Mrs. Hardy, looking up as she remembered—"the fellow that pays your rent here. Won't he raise considerable of a muss if he hears you're engaged to somebody; so much, perhaps, that the other fellow will hear about him?"

Lolita's face darkened.

"How long has it been since he's been here?"

"About a month; he's due to show up and pay another month's rent in advance for you."

"Do you know who he is?"

"No—I haven't the slightest idea, except that when he came here for the first time he seemed to have known some one who had known me, because he was perfectly sure that he could tell me all about you without my getting sore or anything. He seemed to think the world and all of you and was awfully pleased when I was sympathetic over your story instead of hard boiled as some women who haven't lived as much as I have would of been."

"Yes'm." Lolita looked off through the window out into the rain. "He certainly has done a lot for me; he got me out of the tightest place I was ever in in my life and I'll be grateful to him for it until the day I die; but I can't let him go on paying my bills any longer; there's really nothing between us."

"On the level?" exploded Mrs. Hardy.

"Yes, on the level!" Lolita's voice was a little impatient; she could not understand why anyone should think that there was anything between herself and Gray Eyes."

"Pardon, girlie; I didn't mean nothing, only men the devils, they always want value received for everything they do for anybody—I believe you absolutely," she added, and accompanied the words with a look which was so sincere that Lolita smiled at her and impulsively reached out and grasped her hand. "I want you to take this ninety-dollar check, if you will, get it cashed for me at your bank, and keep next week's room rent out of it, and if the Man With the Gray Eyes shows up, tell him that my rent is all paid. I'm not going back to school any more, so he won't have to pay any more tuition there, and, gradually I hope to pay him back for every cent he's spent on me."

"That's the spirit," encouraged Mrs Hardy, rising, "don't owe 'em nothing—that's the best way; no matter how nice they look." With which sophistry she went out of the room.

Lolita was a little piqued that Mr Warrill had not yet called; but it came to her that doubtless the reason for this was that he would not want to wake her and was waiting until he was sure she would be up. He would be down at the newspaper office at this time of the morning, she knew; she decided to call him there.

Going downstairs she dropped a slug in the phone box and gave the number of the paper. Presently she heard Warrill's pleasant voice:

"Warrill speaking."

"Good morning," she breathed into the phone, her heart hammering.

"Good morning," came back in a tone so stiff and cold that she nearly dropped the receiver. Unable to think of a single thing to say in view of this unexpected tone from him she murmured inanely:

"How are you?"

"Fine, thanks, but I came very near being 'bumped off' when I left your place last night. I had no sooner got down the stairs than a rough character walked up to me and hit me as hard as he could in the face before I had time to ward off the blow. When I was down he bent over me and informed me that if I ever went near you—again he'd 'bump me off.' Probably an emissary of your friend who comes up here to see me once in a while. I had supposed, before, from what he had said, that there was nothing between you and him, but I've noticed that, of late, he hadn't been coming up anymore. I never occurred to me, ass that I am, that he was jealous of me."

"Mr. Warrill! You can't really believe—"

"I'm afraid I can, Miss Forbes, and I must say I was never so disappointed in my life. I cared—Oh, lots—and I could forgive you your other, er—contretemps; but, this is a little too much."

With trembling fingers Lolita put the receiver back upon its hook. Evidently one of the men who had brought her back in the car the night before had remained downstairs and had seen her meet Warrill through the window on the second landing in the hall. Her heart numb with the thought that no sane man could be blamed, under the circumstances, for jumping to the conclusion that both Mrs. Hardy and Warrill had jumped to, she went back to her room to dress hurriedly, one thought in mind—she must see the Man With the Gray Eyes at once and get the thing straightened out. She would go out to the Goose and Gander roadhouse; he evidently had something to do with that, for he had walked around as though he owned the place.

In a very short time she was in a taxicab. Surely things could be straightened out somehow; Mr. Warrill could be made to understand, and how could anyone blame him for not understanding? After all, it did look bad. Almost before she knew it, so intense were her thoughts, Lolita again found herself before the old, ramshackle house with the deceiving exterior. Entering the front door of the old house she stood and waited for something to happen. Almost immediately something did. A man stuck his head through a panel in the inner door and looked out at her.

"What do you want?" he asked suspiciously.

"Want to see the boss," she returned firmly.

"The boss?"

"Yes."

He seemed intensely surprised and disappeared from the panel.

Presently another head appeared.

"What do you mean—boss?" the newcomer asked and then paused to look at her closely. Lolita saw that it was one of the four men who had taken her home the night before.

"Oh," he said, "you don't want to see 'the boss,' you want to see 'The Big Guy.' He ain't here; but—well, wait a second." He vanished from the panel. Soon, however, he returned and opened the door and made a motion for her to follow.

Down a rear flight of stairs her guide led her and through a long, dark passageway into a still darker one that smelled damp and foul. Suddenly it became pitch black and Lolita ran into her guide in the blackness.

"Keep a hand on me," he instructed her, "and walk right along. There's nothing you could trip on and no more stairs." Lolita complied. Gradually she became aware that they were in an underground passage, for they had walked twice the length of the old house and in one direction only. She began to grow a little fearful and would have stopped to question her guide if he had not suddenly himself stopped and switched on a light. Looking past him she saw a flight of stone stairs leading up. He started to mount and motioned to her to follow. To Lolita's amazement they presently emerged into what was evidently the kitchen of a well-furnished home. Immediately they passed through swinging doors, along a hallway, up a flight of thickly carpeted stairs and finally wound up in a room on the second floor.

"Sit down," said her guide gruffly. She sat down in a chair and he turned toward the door; as he opened the door and was about to pass through he flung the one word "wait" over his shoulder and closed the door. Almost immediately Lolita heard the lock turn. Walking to the windows to see where she was she discovered that each window was heavily barred. There was, however, another door in the room. She walked swiftly over and opened it. It lead into a sumptuously furnished bedroom. Passing in she examined the window in the bed room; this, too, was heavily barred.

For the first time she felt fear quite definitely. Suppose this gray-eyed person were in love with her, as everyone seemed to think! She returned to the other room and sat down to wait.

Soon she heard steps ascending the stairs and suddenly felt herself in the grip of terror. Suppose it should not be Gray Eyes at all, suppose that if it were Gray Eyes he should prove not to be the kindly, decent type of man that he had so far appeared to be, suppose almost anything in this locked and barred room, far from another dwelling. The key turned in the lock. The door swung open. Lolita stood up, and presently found herself face to face with Gray Eyes.

Her first thought upon facing the man was the same one that she had had when she first saw him. He looked somehow familiar. Yet she could not convince herself that she had ever known him. He crossed the room with short, quick, firm steps and held out his hand to her. Lolita put forth her own hand and felt it grasped firmly in a manly handshake. Presently he sat down. Lolita sat down, and turned toward him resolutely. For some moments there was silence. Lolita was a little disconcerted; she had thought to handle the interview very easily, but this quiet man seemed so forceful, so purposeful; it was somehow like talking to a school teacher. He finally prompted her:

"You wanted to see me?"

"Yes. First of all I want to thank you for having gotten me out of the most terrible situation that I was ever placed in in my entire lifetime; I shall never forget that as long as I live." He unclasped his hands and waved one of them carelessly.

Whales of Antartic Worth Many Dollars

Under modern methods of extracting the valuable products whales caught in the Antarctic will bring as high as $10,000 each, says Popular Mechanics Magazine. The humpbacks, found off the coast of California, sometimes realize $2,500 each, while the white whale of the northern Atlantic is prized for its hide, which is shipped to Scotland for the manufacture of shoestrings. Floating factories that convert the whales into material for the soap companies, bone charcoal for the sugar refining industry, dried meat and chicken feed, simplify the task of turning the catch into profit. Members of the United States biological survey have asked for information about the logs of old whaling vessels, as these records are considered valuable data concerning the migrations of the big sea mammals. Parasites found on the whales may also give a clew to the animals' wanderings. For instance, one species of known southern origin has been discovered on whales in northern waters.

How Sally Aided Cupid

By AD SCHUSTER

(Copyright.)

WHEN Lattimer Nyse, artist in the attic, stopped in the hall to talk to Carol Deming, first floor, and instructor in piano, Sally Soomes halted on the stairway hugging herself in delight. Sally was the "lady of all work" in the rooming establishment of Mrs. Byron Driscoll and Sally's pleasure was the pursuit of romance.

Thereafter when she swept the studio of the musician she made reference to artists and to the splendid pictures she saw when she worked in the room up under the skylights.

"You wouldn't believe it ma'am, she said, "but that Mr. Lattimer can just talk with a paintbrush. That's what it is. He makes the darlingest little cupids you ever saw, and when he has a cow standing down by the water it's so real and artistic with the reflection and all that you can turn it upside down without knowing the difference." She looked at the young woman to note the effect and went on.

"And, yes ma'am, there's one picture of two old gentlemen playing cards, and you just know pretty soon one is going to cheat. I just know some day I'm going to tip the other off."

And in Lattimer's room the privileged Sally talked of music, of a girl who was so kind to the children who came for lessons.

"To see her with those kids, now," she said, "would make you just declare she should have some of her own. And the way she can play the piano. Really, there ain't none of her own. And the way she can play the piano. Really there ain't none of those mechanical ones, no matter how much they cost, can do a bit better."

As the friendship between attic and first floor increased, Sally's heart sang with the joy of match-making. It was all her doing, and she knew it.

"I wouldn't be a bit surprised if they asked me to the wedding. I might be bridesmaid or matron of honor, or something."

When a misunderstanding arose that ended the meetings in the hall, the little walks on Sunday afternoons and the occasional visits to the theater, there were three sad persons in the rooming house and Sally seemed the saddest. When she tried to talk of Lattimer in the studio of the pianist, she was silenced, and not once did she dare mention the musician in the presence of Lattimer's forbidding look.

"Look at that now," she said, glancing over Lattimer's shoulder as he sketched idly with a pencil. "If that wouldn't make a splendid valentine for me to give to my—well, to somebody." Sally blushed as if caught in a secret.

Lattimer finished the sketch hastily and gave it to her.

"It's yours. Send it off to the happy man. Far be it from me to stand in the way of the course of true love."

"My," Sally was happy. "And it's hand-made, too. You know, I like the hand-made pictures every bit as well as those what are printed." And she hurried out carrying her treasure close to her breast.

On Valentine's morning Carol Deming received a penciled sketch which carried no greeting and was without signature. For a moment she was puzzled, then with the pictured Cupid to remind her, remembered the day.

"He drew it, of course," she said. "No one else I know could draw like that. And he remembered Valentine's day and is just old-fashioned and dear enough to remember me. I am going right out and buy him a regular heart and lace valentine and send it up by Sally."

Sally did not wait for the elevator when she got the missive. She all but flew through the halls and up the flights. On tiptoe she approached the artist's room and, following the instruction of Carol, slipped the envelope under the door.

There was no time wasted after its receipt. Lattimer, happy and a little breathless, knocked on Carol's door.

"You are wonderful to remember Valentine's day," he said quite as if she were the first girl ever to take advantage of the day. "And I am so glad you did."

"And you," said Carol, holding out his sketch, "did you think I could not guess whom it was from?"

He looked at it a moment in astonishment, then grinned.

"Say," he said, "when we get married, let's ask Sally. It's just a wild idea of mine that it will give her a lot of pleasure."

Acidity

The common cause of digestive difficulties is excess acid. Soda cannot alter this condition, and it burns the stomach. Something that will neutralize the acidity is the sensible thing to take. That is why physicians tell the public to use Phillips Milk of Magnesia.

One spoonful of this delightful preparation can neutralize many times its volume in acid. It acts instantly; relief is quick, and very apparent. All gas is dispelled; all sourness is soon gone; the whole system is sweetened. Do try this perfect anti-acid, and remember it is just as good for children, too, and pleasant for them to take.

Any drug store has the genuine, prescriptional product.

DR. CALDWELL'S THREE RULES

Dr. Caldwell watched the results of constipation for 47 years, and believed that no matter how careful people are of their health, diet and exercise, constipation will occur from time to time. Of next importance, then, is how to treat it when it comes. Dr. Caldwell always was in favor of getting as close to nature as possible; hence his remedy for constipation is a mild vegetable compound. It can not harm the most delicate system and is not habit forming.

The Doctor never did approve of drastic physics and purges. He did not believe they were good for human beings to put into their system. Use Syrup Pepsin for yourself and members of the family in constipation, biliousness, sour and crampy stomach, bad breath, no appetite, headaches, and to break up fevers and colds. Get a bottle today, at any drugstore and observe these three rules of health: Keep the head cool, the feet warm, the bowels open. For a free trial bottle, just write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. If Back Hurts Begin on Salts

Flush Your Kidneys Occasionally by Drinking Quarts of Good Water

No man or woman can make a mistake by flushing the kidneys occasionally, says a well-known authority. Too much rich food creates acids which clog the kidney pores so that they sluggishly filter or strain only part of the waste and poisons from the blood. Then you get sick. Rheumatism, headaches, liver trouble, nervousness, constipation, dizziness, sleeplessness, bladder disorders often come from sluggish kidneys.

The moment you feel a dull ache in the kidneys or your back hurts, or if the urine is cloudy, offensive, full of sediment, irregular of passage, or attended by a sensation of scalding, begin to drink soft water in quantities; also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any reliable pharmacy and take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush clogged kidneys and stimulate them to activity, also to help neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer cause irritation, thus often relieving bladder disorders.

Jad Salts is inexpensive and cannot injure; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink, which everyone can take now and then to help keep the kidneys clean and the blood pure, thereby often preventing serious kidney complications.

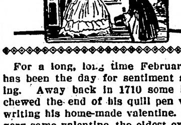
Valentines Through the Centuries



For a long, long time February 14 has been the day for sentiment sending. Away back in 1710 some lover chewed the end of his quill pen while writing his home-made valentine. This very same valentine, the oldest extant, is one of many rare and charming valentines which form a part of the largest and oldest collection of valentines in the world, owned by Frank H. Baer of Cleveland, Ohio.

There are more than 2,000 valentines in the collection. They range from the old German hand-done one of 1710 to those of the time of our Civil war, when American valentines were heavy with paper lace and painted plush and first gave indications of becoming over-ornate and factory made. Valentines, like mother's pies, should be home-made to have the real flavor. And in the beginning they were always individual and naive because the sender usually struggled over his paint box to execute a thing of beauty for his heart's desire.

Germans Made First Valentines.

The oldest valentine is written in German on a small parchment card. The quatrain begins "Liebes Voeglein," then the words are obscured by the dust of time. These two words are all the writing that can be discerned, but there's a sign language around the border, hearts and turtledoves drawn with a crowquill pen dipped in India ink, the eternal symbol. An inner card, very daintily done, shows tulips surrounding a heart which is set on a high hill. Turtledoves, hearts and tulips have been the hall mark of a passionate valentine for more than two centuries, and they may still be seen on many of the 1929 valentines.

Valentines seemed to have been first made in Germany, but it was the English people who took to the idea with determination. The sturdy Anglo-Saxons, stolid on the surface, have sentiment under the skin, and the fourteenth of February was a moment to release their uncorked emotions. These valentines were really love letters raised to the nth degree of home-made art, hand-painted, hand-pricked, hand-pasted.

There was a certain type of valentine the aspiring youth of the early Nineteenth century could buy. These had pictures engraved, but the buyer was to color them, and there was a place for the love message to be written. Perhaps the youths did not want anyone, not even the shopkeepers, to know the depths of their private feelings. So they made up their own love letters, usually in stumbling verse, and also used paint and brush to color the picture.

What a vivid blue the sailor's pants acquired in the valentine sent by an experienced lover, maybe albeit a novice painter. The ribbon on the sailor's cap is blood red, then the sea and sky, in the background, have their share of the blue paint pot. A wave of paint has come on the green shore and the brown roof of the nearby cottage has slid into the sky. All goes to show the work of an ardent lover, whose nerves have been upset by striving to express his desires.

Sailors Symbolize Parting.

Many of these valentines show sailors going to their ships, for an Englishman's life is surrounded by water. Their women have had generations of parting behind them. Adventuring and conquering far horizons were not for the frailer mates of those days. Sailors must go while their sweethearts remain and the English valentines tell of their brave partings.

The English, in their eagerness to have valentines with a flair, imported them from France. The most delightful French valentines sold in England were daintily and intricately cut by French nuns. A hand-painted bouquet of posies would be in the center of the valentine. There would be a small silk thread attached, and, wonder of wonders, the flowers had been most magically cut; by pulling the string they telescoped out. Then the startled sweetheart could get a glimpse through another page where a bold love declaration would be shyly hidden. Under one nosegay of old-fashioned flowers the following verse was gleaned:

Lurking under fairy flowers
Gaily love shall pass the hours,
On the land, or on the stream
Thou art still my own day dream.

May the dearest gift of life,
Like the tendrils of the vine,
Guard thee from the world's rude strife,
Thou my chosen valentine.

Made Fun of the "Love Nest."

The early comic valentines sneered at love in many ways. One amusing missive shows the entrance to a rose covered cottage, a sugary verse below asking the beloved to open the door and see the future love nest. And when the paper door is opened there's the kitchen scene, children tumbling on the floor with cats, pulling tails and screaming, the haggard mistress of the "love nest" looking like a witch, wrinkled and worn and weary. So the old comics poked their wit at love in a cottage.

It's usual to think of young ladies receiving valentines, sitting demurely by the window waiting for the postman, but it's rather amazing to see the bold ones they sent years ago. Real proposals, black on white, with hearts and turtles and tulips to soften the idea. Here's a picture of a cozy chapel leaning against a little hill, below the stark lines to a startled John. First comes his name, then the minister's, and last her's, while below is written shamelessly: "I believe I love thee very dear, Johnny, will be true and faithful till death us do part." Signed, Flora."

Aid me Cupid with your golden dart
And true aim take at my fair one's heart.

For the Sentimental

St. Valentine, patron saint of lovers, has given us a most delightful occasion for the sentimental remembrance of friends, sweethearts and lovers. From the shy, hand-penned note of the knight of olden days to the more conventionalized card or bouquet of today, Valentine's day has drawn to itself many pretty customs. One bit of tradition in this connection is that the birds choose their mates on Valentine's day. Out of this belief grew the custom of drawing chances on names of the opposite sex to see what the fates had in store. Today, with so many of the machine-made cards and much-used sentiments, the old individual significance of the day has given way to the use of the day as a motif for gay and colorful parties and dances.

Valentine

I have no money for a bit of lace
With roses dripping through the sentiment
Around two hearts, which cupid's bows have rent
And bound together, with prophetic grace
But as I darn your sock with tired care
And pass the flashing needle out and in,
Reweaving where the threads have now grown thin,
'Tis more than just a patch that I place there.
For if you look quite closely, you will see
Not only work of hands, from labor deft;
But, caught within its interlacing weft,
I've stitched my loving heart with certainty;
So when your tired feet find paths of care,
And feel the stitches pressing, row on row,
The beating of the heart will let you know
My love goes with you always, everywhere.

Not All Groundhogs Hibernate in Winter

Although the tradition still clings, the belief that the groundhog emerges from his hole promptly on February 2 each year has been long disproved. And now comes J. M. Nelson, who has made a study of the little rodent, to tell us that many of the species do not hibernate at all. Here is his account of their habits as published in the Farm Journal:

"There are some which burrow into the soft earth along streams and store their food for the winter months. These are never seen throughout the winter. They are the real hibernators. But there also are groundhogs which make their homes in caves and sink-holes in which they store quantities of food. They may be seen most any time during the winter, when the weather is fair.

"The groundhogs along rivers often make winter homes in places which later are covered with water for days at a time. Sealed tunnels and air-chambers give protection and, while the water may be running overhead, the groundhog will be enjoying his cache of food which he was wise enough to store before he was shut off from the world."

Quick muscular energy in KARO

There are 120 calories per ounce in Karo—almost twice the energy-giving value of eggs and lean beef, weight for weight.

No effort to digest Karo is required as in many other staple foods.

Which means, Karo supplies energy quickly.

And this is important to those who work and play hard. Especially good is Karo for growing children, as your doctor can tell you.

Serve plenty of Karo—keep the folks healthy, happy and satisfied.

Twenty Years of PROGRESS

TWENTY years ago very few towns had twenty-four hour electric service, and many had no service at all. In all but the largest cities, the service was very unreliable and no one expected anything better.

Thru the building of transmission lines, reliable twenty-four hour electric service is now available in almost every village, and to thousands of farmers as well. Only by transmission lines can the country as a whole be served satisfactorily and economically.

One Dollar Fifty Per Year In Advance

HAD BIG CREAMERY MEETING

One of the largest crowds that have been in town during the winter months, was in here yesterday to attend the annual meeting of the stockholders of the Farmers Co-operative Creamery company. T. B. Folden, secretary of the local institution read the annual report for 1828, which showed a gain over previous year in butter manufactured of 16,328 pounds.

J. P. Augustine and Olaus Rodahl were re-elected to the board of directors.

The program was very good, the first number being a song by a number of high school boys, with Mrs. Einer Loven at the piano.

Stewart McCleod of Goodridge who is the director on the board of the Land O' Lakes Association from the seventeenth district, gave a long talk on the work of that organization during the past year. He explained the methods that they use in marketing their product in the east and how the handle the different departments at the home plant in Minneapolis. The Land O' Lakes creameries have grown by leaps and bounds the past few years.

Mr. McCleod said that the local creamery here was doing as good if not better business than any other creamery in the district.

P. L. Anderson, who was our buttermaker here for nineteen years, sent the board of directors a letter saying that he was sorry that he could not attend the meeting as this would be the first one he missed since 1909.

Short Lessons in Dairying

LESSON 53

Farming deals with three lines of business—production—manufacturing—marketing. Production has to do with the production of farm crops, farm animals and animal products. Manufacturing in the business of farming is in the co-operative creamery. Marketing or merchandising is the sale of farm products whether at the corner store or thru a large co-operative marketing association.

Short Lessons in Dairying will deal with each of these lines during the coming year. Each lesson will contain three paragraphs—one on production—one on manufacturing—and one on marketing. They aim to give timely bits of information in a form that can be quickly and easily read.

The success of farming a as business requires attention to the sale of a product as much as production. The price that a product sells for is as important as its yield.

SCHOOL NOTES

The following compositions have been written by members of the English II class. Their work in composition is very commendable and it is our earnest disire, a faculty, that parents should be interested in the work that is being achieved in our local school.

A Magazine Rally

One morning last fall we were greatly pleased when Mr. Urquart, of the Curtis Publishing Co. came to give us a lecture; as none of us had studied our lessons.

We became very interested when he told us about his plan of selling Curtis publications, in order to obtain money for our Auxilinry Fund. Mr. Urquarts' plans were, that we choose sides, (the Reds and the Greens) having a captain and a supervisor for both sides. The side selling the largest number of subscriptions were to be named the winners and would be entertained at a party given by the losers. After the plan had been accepted, Ethel Johnson and Gertrude Reierson were elected captains.

"How many subscriptions are the Greens aiming to get?" Mr. Urquart asked Gertrude.

"Twenty-five," was her reply.

"That will be hard to beat. Ethel think you'll win out over that?"

"Yes, we'll go one better—twenty-six."

The first few days of the contest did not look very hopeful for the Reds. The Greens were ahead!

Finally, the Reds begin selling subscriptions with such vigor and vim; that now the Post-office is filled with Home Journals.

When the contest closed the Reds were proclaimed winners. Twenty-one subscriptions to the fourteen subscriptions the Greens had sold.

Then, last week, the Greens finally gave the Reds their party. Although they were very slow about giving us the party, it was worth waiting for, because of the good time enjoyed by all.

Mr. Urquart left plans for a Three-Ring Circus, to be given at the party, Three rings were drawn on the floor with chalk. Here the Greens represented monkeys, giraffes and many other animals, never seen in any other circus. They played their parts very well, especially the monkeys.

Miss Torblaa was called upon to crawl through a hoop blindfolded. She was unable to find the hoop, but tried her best to squeeze through a rubber doughnut.

The sword swallowing stunt was not very successful because the actor had indigestion.

"Art" Holmas acted the part of an old "Sogne" lady very well, considering sixty-three deseases in the Kuriko book and one hundred and twenty-three deseases in the Pinkham book.

The Reds surely enjoyed the party and hope the Greens will lose next year too—they showed us such a good time.

The National Catholic Shrine

THE shrine of the Immaculate Conception at Brookland, District of Columbia, now building, promises to be the largest Catholic church on the Western hemisphere—465 feet long and 238 feet wide, its massive dome 90 feet in diameter rising 254 feet, its slender campanile or bell tower towering skyward 332 feet—Romanesque in style. Exclusive of interior adornments and art works of fabulous value, the cost of construction has been set at $5,000,000.

The crypt—unexcelled in our land, it is claimed—a veritable forest of rare marble columns gathered from all parts of the world, is to contain 15 chapels, with a main altar and will in itself be a noble cathedral with seats for 1,500 persons. Its ceiling, capable of sustaining a weight of approximately 1,000,000 pounds, will support the main floor which will seat some 7,000 persons. The foundation stone, set September 23, 1920, was the occasion of one of the greatest religious ceremonies ever held in America.

The entire world has been searched for embellishments, one of the most outstanding of which will be a huge reproduction in mosaic of "The Immaculate Conception" from the pope. The statue of "Our Lady of Washington"—selected as patroness of this national shrine—is to stand in front of it and present the first appeal to all visitors.

Erected as an everlasting monument evidencing the love of the Catholics of America for Mary Immaculate, it will proclaim "The glory of God, the power of goodness of His Divine Son, the love of the Holy Spirit, and the intimate union of Mary Immaculate with the Blessed Trinity in her unique quality of Mother of God."

OLD FOLKS SAY DR. CALDWELL WAS RIGHT

The basis of treating sickness has not changed since Dr. Caldwell left Medical College in 1875, nor since he placed on the market the laxative prescription he had used in his practice.

He treated constipation, biliousness, headaches, mental depression, indigestion, sour stomach and other indispositions entirely by means of simple vegetable laxatives, herbs and roots. These are still the basis of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, a combination of senna and other mild herbs, with pepsin.

The simpler the remedy for constipation, the safer for the child and for you. And as you can get results in a mild and safe way by using Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, why take chances with strong drugs?

A bottle will last several months, and all can use it. It is pleasant to the taste, gentle in action, and free from narcotics. Elderly people find it ideal. All drug stores have the generous bottles, or write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. BB, Monticello, Illinois, for free trial bottle.

Mother was telling of some place she had taken the older boy when he was quite small. Three-year-old Billy piped up, "Was I there, too, mother?" He was told that he was not, as he wasn't even born.

Makes Life Sweeter

When tongue or breath tells of acid condition—correct it with a spoonful of Phillips. Most men and women have been comforted by this universal sweetener—more mothers should invoke its aid for their children. It is a pleasant thing to take, yet neutralizes more acid than the harsher things too often employed for the purpose. No household should be without it.

Phillips is the genuine, prescriptional product physicians endorse for general use; the name is important. "Milk of Magnesia" has been the U. S. registered trade mark of the Charles H. Phillips Chemical Co. and its predecessor Charles H. Phillips since 1875.

"It was nothing—no trouble at all. You took it all a little too seriously, anyway—that is, the death of that chap. You couldn't help that, and there is no reason why you should condemn yourself for it. Of course, the thing which led up to it cannot be so lightly disposed of—still, it would be foolish to condemn yourself for that. It was a lesson, a rather hard and advanced one, to be sure, and one that is to be regretted, and yet, there is only one thing to do—put it behind you, forget about it, and be different in the future."

"Believe me, I shall," asserted Lolita confidently, "have, already. That is one of the things which I wanted to see you about. You see, I can't allow you to go on paying my expenses. I owe you enough as it is, and I want to pay you back just as soon as possible. In the meantime, though I hope you won't think that I'm ungrateful, I am going to ask you not to, er—look after me any more."

"If," began Gray Eyes slowly, "you got into another bad scrape, who would you turn to to get you out of it?"

Lolita thought a long time; she had not expected a question like this.

"But I do not intend to get into any more scrapes. It was the first one I ever got into in my life, and I am sure that it was the last one." He shot his next remark at her like a bullet.

"Yet you let a good-for-nothing sheik pick you up the other night and bring you out here, nearly getting you into a second scrape as bad as the first one." Lolita hung her head. She had nothing to reply to this. He went on in a soothing tone.

"Never mind. I know what prompted you to do that. I don't at all agree that you should so have given in to life as to want to throw yourself away because of a petty discouragment; still, I have done so many fool things in my own lifetime, I can hardly condemn anyone else for being foolish." He was silent for a long time, eyeing her speculatively. His next remark a little disconcerted Lollet.

"You are very pretty. I sometimes have occasion to hire beautiful women to sing or dance—in various places. I may not be a competent judge of feminine beauty; still, I know the type of woman that appeals to most men. You are particularly appealing, and you are deliciously young. It is unfortunate that nature does not equip girls as beautiful as yourself with character equivalent to their beauty, but you are going to develop strength of character—and I am going to help you."

"Why are you so interested in me?"

He did not at once reply, but sat moodily thinking; his eyes held a faraway look as he gazed out of the window, deliberately avoiding her gaze. To her amazement, instead of replying to her question, he suddenly turned upon her, shifting the subject completely.

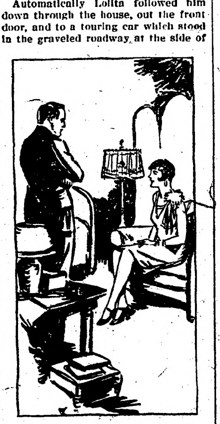
"Do you happen to know that Mr. Warrill is practically engaged to marry a Miss Pringle?"

Lolita felt something within herself give way. Almost before she knew it the tears were rolling down her cheeks. Somehow the quiet, firm way in which he had said it was convincing—she felt that it was true beyond a doubt. He rose from his chair, picked her up bodily and reseated himself, holding her in his lap. Some instinct within her banished all thoughts of anything but the need for a comforter. She buried her face on his shoulder and cried so that it shook her whole body. His hand patted her shoulder, and he bent over and kissed her upon the temple. For one moment the terrified thought came to her that he, too, was attempting to make love to her; yet, also, some other deeper feeling told her with decidedly more conviction that he was not intent upon anything of the kind. Presently she struggled to her feet, walked over to the window, looked out, seeing nothing of the scene without, seeing only the devastating scene within her own consciousness. She bit her lip and swung about to find Gray Eyes just behind her, watching her curiously.

"I don't care," she told him firmly, hands clenched. "Even if what you say about Mr. Warrill is true, I don't care. I'm not going to let it break my heart or ruin my life. I do love him, and I probably always shall, and if he is indeed interested in Miss Pringle and has been all of the time that he has been making love to me it is the most awful thing that has happened to me yet, but somehow I know I'll bear it. I'm not going to let every little thing in life knock me over without half a struggle any more. I'm going to study and be somebody, and not be like most women—dependent upon the whim of some man for my happiness." He stepped closer to her, took her shoulders in a firm grasp, looked deeply into her eyes; Lolita felt as though he were looking into her very soul, and somehow she was almost proud of what he might find there. It was the first time in her life that she had ever felt that way. half of her was in chaos at the thought of Warrill's defection, but another half of her was singing a brave little song that was particularly sweet and new. Evidently, whatever Gray Eyes saw deep in her eyes satisfied him intensely. He let go of her shoulders and held out his right hand. Involuntarily she put forth her own. He gave her hand an almost cruel wringing shake, and, without another word, turned to the table, picked up his hat, opened the door and was gone. Surprised, Lolita went over to the door to open it and follow him, remembering that he had answered none of the questions she had come to ask; but the door was locked. A little dismayed at this, she stood thinking for a moment. Almost immediately the door was open, and the man who had led her through the underground passageway stood in it.

"Come on," he said gruffly.

Automatically Lolita followed him down through the house, out the front door, and to a touring car which stood in the graveled roadway at the side of the house. He opened the door of the car and stood respectfully while she entered, whereupon he mounted to the driver's seat and started at a dizzying speed toward town. In an incredibly short space of time Lolita found herself back before the building where she roomed. Without a word the driver opened the car door for her, and she dismounted. He climbed back into the driver's seat, jerked the car around in the street, and set off back toward the direction from which he had come.



She Walked Over and Sat Down in a Chair.

Entering the house, Lolita went directly to her room, her mind a turmoil of conflicting emotions. Half of her was despondent, the other half was still singing that new, strange little song. Vaguely the sense of it all came to her. The brave little song within was undoubtedly the beginning of definite character. Her very ears seemed to ring with new capacity to hear, and she seemed to see the whole of life in a new light. Full to the brim of this new something she sat down before her typewriter. The man who had driven her home, Gray Eyes, the dark, gloomy day, her own strange, buoyant, brave feeling—all of it began to weld together around the outline of a plot. Presently she was pounding ambitiously upon the typewriter. Page after page practically wrote itself as an excellent story plot unfolded, filled with very real characterizations, compounded of the people with whom she had come in contact that day. It had grown dark outside by the time she had filled the last sheet of paper, which contained the end of the story.

Rising, a little weary, mentally pushing away the gloom which descended upon her immediately she had finished the story, she decided to go to a restaurant and get something to eat. As she approached the brilliantly lighted district, the very electric lights seemed to dance with a new intensity; she was still obsessed by the dual feeling of sadness and brave gayety, the strangest feeling that she had ever experienced in her entire lifetime—the feeling that she had worked into every line of the story.

She continued on half a block or so until she reached the pleasant little waffle shop where she often dropped in for supper. As she took her seat and gave her order a sudden wave of lonesomeness swept over her, but she managed to detach herself from it completely and view it almost objectively, as though it were some one else who was feeling lonesome.

When she left the restaurant she started back the way that she had come; and, when she had nearly reached her home a huge sign several blocks south beckoned enticingly toward one of the largest dance halls in Chicago. For just a moment lonesomeness again tugged at her. One could go to the big dance hall and almost instantly lonesomeness would be dissolved in companionship. Firmly she continued on toward her room. When she reached it and opened the door, she was surprised to find the light on.

Entering she came face to-face with Mr. Warrill, who stood in the middle of the floor, in a waiting attitude.

"I took the liberty of reading your story, and indicating a few changes on the border of the manuscript that will help you to sell it. It's by far the best thing you've done yet—you have real power. You will some day be a great writer I think." She listened to his words with mixed emotions and finally said:

"Don't you think it is rather informal of you to come here and enter my room like this?" He grinned in a way that shook her firm resolutions to their foundations and replied boyishly:

"Yes, I do."

CHAPTER VIII

Without further words Warrill stepped forward and took her into his arms. Desperately Lolita fought off the desire to remain there. His arms were big and strong, and he was just tall enough so that her head lay nicely upon his shoulder; after a second she pushed him away with a mighty shove and stood back, her face flaming, trembling from head to foot. Warrill looked at her in surprise.

"Why, what's the matter with you?" he asked in astonishment. For a moment she did not reply. His eyes were filled with frank desire. Lolita a little vainly reflected that if she had ever seen her fresh young beauty reflected in a man's eyes she saw it so reflected now. That there was color in her cheeks after her brisk walk she knew; and that the last few weeks had taken the anxious, pinched look from her face she also knew. For a moment she was glad of the beauty that was hers, and then again it came to her that it was, after all, hardly more than a curse, for it was forever making life hard for her to live.

She walked over and sat down in a chair, motioned for him to be seated. He slumped down into a chair and lit a cigarette. After a moment she said directly:

"I understand that you are engaged to marry Miss Pringle." He started, and before he could think a second time ejaculated:

"How did you know? Why, it was only last night that I—"

"Only last night that you became engaged; yet you come here, to my room, tonight. What sort of a man are you?"

Under this biting question he remained for a moment silent.

"Lolita," he began slowly, "surely you, of all persons, can afford to exhibit a little patient understanding when it comes to the vagaries of others. Surely your own experiences with life have been nothing to entitle you to condemn airily without trying to understand motives. I love you, and I do not love Miss Pringle—and yet I am going to marry her. Although she works on a newspaper, it is only as a sort of lark. She is tremendously wealthy; or at least her parents are; she will inherit it all some day."

"I think," gasped Lolita, "that you're despicable. Even if you do not consider me in the matter at all, much as I personally dislike Miss Pringle, I should certainly not wish to see you break her heart by marrying her for her money. I wish that you would please go."

"How can you take such a position?" Warrill objected angrily. "Look at the things you've been involved in, you—"

"I did make one terrible mistake, it is true; but my whole life since then has been, and shall always be, an effort to wipe that out and make up for it in every way possible. I should think that you, of all persons, would be big enough and broad enough to help and not hinder me in my effort to come back."

Book of Kells Great Treasure of Ireland

About the time that the Roman empire was sinking and London was little more than a haunted ruin on a hill, there was an unknown Irish monk engaged, day after day, year after year, at his writing table in an abbey at Kells, Ireland. He was transcribing the Gospels and making a book that has survived to this day as one of the rarest and most beautiful in existence.

It is called the book of Kells and today it reposes in the treasure room of Trinity college, Dublin, where many a collector has viewed it and had offers spurned. Its writer enriched it with a thousand intricacies of design, and men looking at it today wonder not only at the fertility of his brain but at the keenness of his eyesight, so microscopical are the lines. Once the book was stolen and found two months later in an earth pile where the thief had flung it when he decided it was of no value. Now the book is considered the most perfect expression of Christian art that has survived the Golden age of Ireland.—London Express.

Pretty Samplers

The old-fashioned sampler consisted of a square of perforated canvas, the rows of perforation being equally spaced. Designs were stamped on the canvas and filled in with different colored worsteds, the stitches forming little "x's." On the finest canvas this would almost give the effect of a painting.

Fight Over Milk Costs Lives of Three Men

Hondo, Texas.—An argument over a quart of milk cost the lives of a father and his sons here. L. Barrientes, a merchant, and his sons, Joe and Alifonsio, were shot to death in the father's store. Louis Arcos surrendered to authorities in connection with the shooting. According to Sheriff J. F. Bader of Medina county, the shooting grew out of an argument over a quart of milk which Arcos said was spoiled and which Barrientes had refused to replace.

TELLS OF WEIRD PACT OF DEATH

Former Wife Agreed to State Killing Man.

San Francisco.—An amazing story of a death pact by which Garland Williams, twenty-eight, was to kill his former wife and then submit to execution by the state was related to police by Williams after his arrest on a charge of murdering the woman, Mrs. Lorraine Ambrose, who was found choked to death here.

Williams said Mrs. Ambrose had begged him to turn on the gas so they might die together, but he had refused, saying he could never commit suicide.

"I agreed to kill her and then give myself up so that the law would take care of my death," police said Williams told them. They added that Williams' story had the ring of truth, although several points required investigation.

The prisoner said he had "several little things to attend to" and had deferred surrendering until his affairs were in order.

Williams asserted he and his wife were happy together for four years, until they were separated by "a double crossing friend" who carried tales to Mrs. Williams.

"She left me, and I did not follow or molest her," police quoted Williams as saying. "The other day she came to my room and wanted to talk things over.

"Two days later she called me on the telephone and asked me to visit her. We went to my rooms.

"She tried to coax me to turn on the gas so we could die together, but I told her I could not kill myself.

"Then I thought of letting the police take care of me. She agreed to that plan.

"'Be sure and do a good job,' she said. 'Good-by, Bill.'

"She just lay still while I choked her. Then I cut her wrists with a safety razor blade.

"I fooled around there for an hour or so, made myself a cup of coffee, and then left. I was going to give myself up as soon as I made a few arrangements, but the police got me before I was quite ready.

"It doesn't matter, though, because I am ready to die. She's waiting for me, and there won't be anybody to come between us over there."

Kills Pal in Triangle Causing Four Deaths

Joplin, Mo.—A series of eternal triangles in the lives of two friends had taken the lives of four with the death recently of John Cole, thirty-five years old, near Baxter Springs, Kan.

The latest killing was laid to D. L. Nutt, friend of the victim, who is held in jail here with his nineteen-year-old son, both charged with first degree murder. The son is said to have grappled with Cole while the father, who has but one arm, fired two shots into Cole's body after Cole was found with Mrs. Nutt.

Nutt killed a man twenty years ago when he found him with his wife. He was acquitted. Ten years ago Cole killed two men for making advances to his wife, and was acquitted.

Cole had lived with the Nutt family for years until several weeks ago, when Nutt's wife left Nutt, presumably because of a friend. A reconciliation was effected, but shortly afterward Nutt found Cole and Mrs. Nutt together in the Nutt home.

Lied About Age of Son, Pays Fare 20 Years Late

Dallas, Texas.—A woman, who 20 years ago lied to a conductor, telling him her son was too young to pay fare, walked into a railroad office here, and handed a clerk $35.60, fare for the child plus interest. The name of the woman is being kept secret.

"My husband was sick and money was scarce, but this always hurt me, and I am glad to make restitution," the woman explained.

Aged Woman Hangs Self

Chicago.—At the age of eighty-four Mrs. Anna Lauman felt she was "in the way." So she bid the members of her family good-by, climbed the stairs to the attic, and hanged herself, being found dead.

Binghamton, N. Y.—Swallowing a toy balloon, Margaret Robinson of this city strangled to death en route to a hospital.

"Lucile is the Happiest Girl"

So many mothers nowadays talk about giving their children fruit juices, as if this were a new discovery. As a matter of fact, for over fifty years, mothers have been accomplishing results far surpassing anything you can secure from home prepared fruit juices, by using pure, wholesome California Fig Syrup, which is prepared under the most exacting laboratory supervision from ripe California Figs, richest of all fruits in laxative and nourishing properties.

It's marvelous to see how bilious, weak, feverish, sallow, constipated, under-nourished children respond to its gentle influence; how their breath clears up, color flames in their cheeks, and they become sturdy, playful, energetic again. A Western mother, Mrs. H. J. Stoll, Valley P. O., Nebraska, says: "My little daughter, Roma Lucile, was constipated from babyhood. I became worried about her and decided to give her some California Fig Syrup. It stopped her constipation quick; and the way it improved her color and made her pick up made me realize how run-down she had been. She is so sturdy and well now, and always in such good humor that neighbors say she's the happiest girl in the West."

Like all good things, California Fig Syrup is imitated, but you can always get the genuine by looking for the name "California" on the carton.

THE LADY IN DISTRESS

(Copyright.)

ALICIA chewed the stub of the pencil. The carving knife wasn't in reach and she firmly believed in the landlady's promise to spank her if she got out of bed. That was the disadvantage of being eleven years old and a recent inmate of a hospital. People bossed you. The pencil stub and a sheet of heavily-scented lavender paper had been inveigled out of Mrs. Glandon by a promise of impeccable behavior while the week's marketing was being done.

Alicia wrote laboriously and eyed the result with marked dissatisfaction, but there was neither time nor paper for another effort, Chick Ayers would be along on his bicycle any minute now and she mustn't keep him waiting.

She hailed the telegraph messenger from her window, in a thin, high treble that carried distinctly down into the street. Chick's head came up and he waved a hand as he sped by. Alicia frantically wagged the square envelope, and Chick nearly ran down a flustered old lady on the crossing. In two minutes he was up the stairs, panting.

"What you want, Alicia? I'm in an awful hurry."

Alicia held out the envelope. "Please, Chick, deliver it to him yourself. It's very 'portant."

Chick started at the address. "Cunningham Reed!" he whispered in awe. "Why—why, Alicia, what you doing?"

"Please hurry!" said Alicia and fell back on the pillows. She was still very weak. A three months' siege with typhoid fever doesn't leave much of even sturdy constitutions and Alicia had never been exactly husky. But there was a smile on the little white face under its mass of dark red hair which the breeze through the window stirred gently.

Compton Niel put down the burnt cork and picked up the lipstick, viewing the reflection in the mirror with complete detachment. He could put on a perfect make-up without giving conscious thought to the matter. He was thinking that this was Friday and that tomorrow night would be his last appearance at any of the Reed theaters.

"Reed says you ain't got no spring," the theater manager had brutally told Neil. Brady had said that the first of the week and Niel had straightway sought an interview with Reed. Niel had a new act that he believed would go over big. If Reed would only listen to him! But Reed wouldn't. He sent out word that a little new blood wouldn't do the Reed chain of theaters any harm, and Niel had gone away with a sinking heart. God knew that he was aware that there was not any spring in him! A man couldn't watch the only being in the world that he loved make an eight or ten weeks' fight with death and not lose his spring. Besides, since coming from the hospital Alicia had not slept well and Niel had not been getting his rest.

And, of course, the little imp had gotten it out of him about the failure to land a new contract. She always did. One couldn't lie to her. "And now," she remarked gravely, "you are a gentleman in distress." Throughout her illness, Niel had presented flowers and picture books and puzzles with the elaborate ceremony that delighted her and always to a "lady in distress."

"There will be a pair of us," he answered ruefully, "if I don't get a new booking." He had grinned and joked a good deal, but he was afraid that he hadn't fooled his small daughter much. She was an uncanny little piece. She sometimes read his thoughts, as: "Daddy Comp, what rent do we have to pay the hospital?" the day he had drawn the last dollar of his savings account. . . . He'd keep on his make-up when he went home tonight. Alicia always considered that a special favor. It was not easy to perform for another half hour when every muscle ached, but it was worth it to see the sparkling eyes and flushing face.

Cunningham Reed eyed his secretary sternly. That young lady was nearly in tears. "I—I couldn't help it, sir. He wouldn't take no for an answer. Said his orders were to put it in your hand, and there was just no stopping him!"

Reed dismissed her with a nod and turned over the missive that the determined telegraph messenger had shoved at him. He wouldn't have been human if he hadn't been a little curious. What peculiar urgency was there that a mere boy should storm a victorious way through three offices? Why hadn't he held the boy? He looked at the penciled address, ripped open the envelope and scowled unbelievingly at the owlish characters that staggered uncertainly across the pale purple page.

"1497 Bonant street.

"Dear Mr. Reed, will you please come here at 9 tonight. Not any later.

"A LADY IN DISTRESS."

"What the devil!" muttered Reed. "Hey, Welton!" A young man appeared from some inner recess. "What do you make of this?"

Welton studied the note. "Doesn't look good to me, sir."

Reed's eyes softened with a twinkle he carefully concealed. "Why?"

"Well, they've made it look like a child's writing and, obviously, no child would be writing to you. I'd say that it looks very much like a plot. Shall I get hold of a secret service—?"

"No-o," decided Reed with a serious face. "And you need say nothing about it to anyone, Welton."

"No, sir, of course not. The best way, no doubt, is just to ignore these things."

Alicia was almost in tears. Here it was nearly ten o'clock and there had been no knock on her door. She had directed Mrs. Glandon to show up at once any gentleman who should call. The landlady supposed that the child was playing some game with her father so was hardly prepared, when she answered a knock at nearly ten o'clock to confront a gentleman whose clothes, even to her unfamiliar eye, spoke that magic word, success.

"I was told," said the gentleman, "to call at 1497 Bonant street this evening."

"Yes—oh, yes! Well—" fluttered Mrs. Glandon, her landladyish aplomb for once completely shaken. "I'll show you right up. This way, sir," and then, "Alicia, here is the gentleman."

"Oh!" said a voice that seemed to take hold of Reed's heart, he couldn't for the life of him tell why. He entered the room to see an eager head raised from a pillow. He looked around expectantly. There was no one else in sight except Mrs. Glandon, who had planted herself inside the door. Reed looked at her, just a glance that slid on and slid off, and Mrs. Glandon went out and closed the door and they could hear her retreat down the hall.

"It can't be," said Reed, smiling at Alicia, "that you are the lady in distress."

"Oh, please, yes, sir, I am! Will you sit down? We must hurry because, you see, Daddy Comp will be home in a few minutes and if he finds you here I don't know what he will think!"

The words came tumbling forth almost in one breath and when they were out Alicia did not know what to say next.

Reed was entertained. He had a dramatist's taste for mystery and the face against the pillow was very appealing. He leaned comfortably back in his chair and the act had the effect of upsetting Alicia's equilibrium completely. She had looked for an uncompromising individual who would have to be won. But this man seemed so ordinary that for a few minutes she was literally tongue-tied.

While they sat gazing mutely at one another a step sounded in the hall and Alicia sat up in despair. "You see!" she cried reproachfully. "Oh, why didn't you come before!"

Reed answered involuntarily, "I couldn't get away."

The words were not out of his mouth before the door opened under the hand of a most villainous looking negro in flopping overalls and a violently checkered shirt. Reed had seen this apparation before, but for the minute there was no connection in his mind and he came to his feet, startled. Alicia clapped her hands involuntarily.

"Oh, Daddy Comp, you kept it all on!"

Compton Niel was grinning feebly out of his impossible mouth, though there wasn't a particle of grin in his thoughts. What was Reed possibly doing here?

Then recollection began to assail Reed and he ejaculated slowly. "Well—I'll be—!"

The tone, for some reason, rendered Niel furious. It implied something outrageous and he retorted. "So will I, for that matter."

Alicia looked from one to the other, understanding nothing but their tones, but sufficiently alarmed by those.

"It was a clever dodge, Niel," said Reed deliberately. "I don't know where you learned that I was especially susceptible to children. I don't deny the weakness, but it is the first time I have ever had anyone try to play on it. You—"

But Alicia had suddenly comprehended the spirit if not the words of Reed's charge and she flew out of bed, stumbling over her nightgown as she confronted the dumfounded theater owner.

"Oh, aren't you horrid! You knew my Daddy Comp didn't—didn't—I told you! What makes you so mean?" and she burst into tears and quietly fainted.

Niel had her back in bed on the instant. He took the water Reed handed him, then commanded savagely: "Get out!"

Reed sat down and when Niel again turned on him spoke quietly:

"When she is feeling all right so she can watch, too, we'll listen to that new act of yours."

For His Purpose, Car Was Worth the Money

Young Feasley not long ago bought an old "used" sport roadster. The dealer didn't have the nerve to call it "second hand," for everyone knew it had belonged to at least a dozen different people. Feasley paid only $30 for it. Nevertheless some of his neighbors couldn't understand why he had invested even $30 in such a back-number proposition, which was too ancient to be called an automobile and not quite old enough to be classed as an antique.

"What do you suppose Feasley wanted to buy that old roadster for—when he knows he can't depend on it to get him back from anywhere?" asked Lambert, the druggist.

"Oh," explained young Day, his head clerk, "he don't want it to get him back from anywhere. All he wants is to drive a mile into the country and then park by the side of the road. It's a wonderful car for parking purposes."—Pathfinder Magazine.

Greeks Got Alphabet From the Phoenicians

The Phoenicians are generally believed to have produced the first alphabet and from their group of sound symbols have grown all of the alphabets in existence today. The Greeks, it is known, composed their alphabet from the Phoenician as a result of their trade with the first sailors. The Romans took their alphabet from the Greek and the English alphabet comes directly from the Latin.

Only minor changes have come down in the English alphabet from that of the Romans. The English added the letter "j" for which "i" was used in the Latin and added "w" to the Latin "uv."

Probably the best explanation of the Phoenician alphabet's origin lies in the roving disposition of that people. Stopping at various ports along the Mediterranean they adopted certain characters of the cuneiform languages of all the countries and adapted them to their own usage.—Detroit News.

"Jointing" Logs Easy, According to Expert

"Jointing" the logs in a rustic cabin isn't "tricky"—if you know how, declared Frank E. Brimmer. To illustrate his remark he proceeds to tell how it's done, in an interesting article in Field and Stream.

All tree logs are not just perfect, he admits, but the trunks can be laid butt to top and make a fairly good wall. On handling them as the wall goes up, he says to use an incline and a chain. With a steel square, a sharp ax and a piece of chalk any man can cut the joints. Before sawing out the windows or doors he suggests that the logs be spiked with a transverse two-by-four to hold them in place. A plummet line helps to keep the wall in line, he finds.

Still Fighting On

President Butler of Columbia, apropos of the jibbing of France and other countries over Secretary Kellogg's anti-war pact, said at a reception:

"War would vanish if mankind really worked against it. If men only persevered in wise things as splendidly as they do in foolish ones the millennium would be here next week.

"'Jones is a man of remarkable perseverance,' a banker said to me.

"'Yes?' said I.

"'Yes. He's tried 238 cures for baldness in the last 19 years, and he's still fighting on as hard as ever.'"

...KARO contains almost twice the energy value of eggs...pound for pound

There are 120 calories per ounce in Karo—almost twice the energy value of eggs and lean beef, pound for pound—

And, of course, this means that Karo is not only a delicious syrup but a great energy-giving food.

The energy Karo gives is supplied immediately—without taxing the digestive system—as in the case of many other foods.

Convince yourself that Karo is very economical too—compare the price of Karo per pound with other staple foods.

Serve lots of Karo to the entire family—especially the children, who like Karo and who thrive on it.

We have now enjoyed a few days of milder weather than that which we almost got used to in January.

When speaking of the weather reminds us of a letter we received this week from B. C. Hagglund at Rocky Mountain House up in Alberta, in which he states that one day they enjoyed the fun of seeing the thermometer drop to 67 below zero for a short time.

Say! You fellows up there in the ragged edges of the rockies better tack the old thermometer on the wall with a railroad spike so that in case it should happen to drop lower next time, it will not pull out the nail and fall on some chinaman.

Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hagen of Grand Forks returned to their home last week after spending a month visiting at the home of Mr. and Mrs. John Hagber.

How to Make the Home Town Great

A little more virtue and a little less shame,
A little more thought for the other man's rights;
A little less self in our chase for delights.
A little more loving, a little less hate—
Are all that is needed to make the town great.

A little more trusting, a little less fearing.
A little more patience in trouble and pain,
A little more kindness worked into strife.
Are all that is needed to glorify life.

A little more kindness, a little less greed;
A little more smile, a little less frown,
A little less kicking a man when he's down,
A little more laugh, and a little less cry;
A little more flowers on the pathway of life
A fewer on graves at the end of strife.

A little more courage when the pathway's rough,
A little more honor, a little less greed,
A little more action, a little less bluff;
A little more kindness by you and by me,
And oh, what a wonderful town this would be!

Short Lessons in Dairying

LESSON 54

PRODUCTION: Dairying pays best because a dairy cow is the most productive of all animals. For every 100 pounds of digestible dry matter consumed, the dairy cow returns an average of 18 pounds of human food in the form of digestible dry matter, the pig 15 pounds, the hen 5 pounds and the steer a little less than 3 pounds.

MANUFACTURING: There are around 1500 co-operative creameries in Minnesota and neighboring states—Wisconsin—Iowa—the Dakotas—and Michigan. They pay well when properly patronized and managed because they give farmers the manufacturers' profit. Every farmer should attend their annual meeting and study the report.

MARKETING: The price of butter doubled with the coming of co-operative creameries. They made it possible for farmers to sell their product beyond the local store. They made it possible to get better price for better quality. They taught better business methods.

SCHOOL NOTES

The following compositions have been written by members of the English II class. Their work in composition is very commendable and it is our earnest disire, a faculty, that parents should be interested in the work that is being achieved in our local school.

A Magazine Rally

It was the latter part of October and Mr. Vieths had just announced that Mr. Urquart, of the Curtis Publishing Co., was going to speak to us.

Mr. Urquart spoke on "How to be a Successful Salesman." He told us he would like to have the high school sell subscriptions for the Saturday Evening Post, Ladies Home Journal and Country Gentleman. The school was to receive fifty cents on every subscription sold. This money was to go to the Auxiliary Fund.

The students were divided into two groups, namely, the Reds and the Greens. Gertrude Reierson was elected leader of the Greens and Ethel Johnson leader of the Reds. Dennis Wegge was elected secretary, Mr. Vieths advisor of the Greens and Miss Torblaa advisor of the Reds.

The contest was to be open one week and the losing side had to give the winners a party and a Three Ring Circus. The first day the Greens were ahead, but when the Reds began traveling they sure broke the traffic rules and beat the Green in a hurry.

The Reds sold twenty-one subscriptions and the Greens fourteen, this would give the school seventeen dollars and fifty cents.

The Greens are yet undecided whether it was Miss Torblaa's excellent advice or the Reds superior salesmanship that made them win.

Rewards were given to each student who sold three or more subscriptions, by the Curtis Publishing Co.

Among the important features of the program were acts by many different animals, also Norwegian and American dialect readings and an animal band. After the program, lunch was served and the rest of the evening was spent by playing games.

Arthur Holmos.

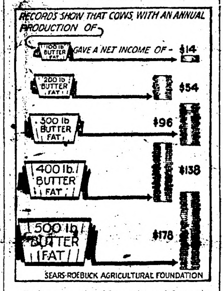
Save Calves Only From Good Milkers



Dairymen should avoid raising any heifer calves except the daughters of high-producing cows and pure-bred dairy bulls, says the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. Likewise, they should take advantage of prevailing high prices for beef to cull out the boarders and low-producing cows.

High production per cow rather than a large herd is the signboard pointing to dairy profits. Records of cow testing associations show the cows producing an average of only 100 pounds of butterfat a year returned an income of only $14 more than the cost of the feed consumed. Cows producing 200 pounds returned $54 more, those producing 300 pounds returned $96 more, those producing 400 pounds returned $138 more, and 500-pound cows gave an income of $178 over the cost of feed. In general, each 100 pounds' increase in butterfat resulted in an increase of $40 in income over cost of feed.

Saving about two heifer calves out of five will maintain dairy herds, so that it is easy at any time to increase materially the number raised. In the last few years, good prices for milk and butterfat, for suplus milk cows and for discarded cows sold on the beef market, coupled with relatively cheap feed grains and hay, have encouraged farmers to save an increasing number of calves. Three or four years ago, not enough calves were saved to maintain herds fully, but probably 15 to 20 per cent more were saved in the spring of 1928 than at that time and more than are needed merely for replacements. There is some danger that too many will be raised in another year or two if this tendency persists.

The increase in number of heifers now maturing is likely to bring somewhat lower prices for dairy products by the time calves saved in the next year or two are in milk. Also, beef prices probably are at or close to the peak of their cycle. Low grade beef from old milk cows sells at extremely low prices when the supply of good beef is ample.

Saving calves only from high-producing cows will prevent any tendency to an unduly rapid increase in output of dairy products, according to the Foundation. By rigid culling and the use of pure-bred dairy sires, and by proper feeding, average production of milk per cow can be increased 100 to 200 pounds each year. This will take care of the annual growth in consumer demand without requiring an increase in herds. That this can be accomplished is shown by the record of the last eight years, as the number of cows is but little larger than in 1920, while dairy production has increased more than one-third.

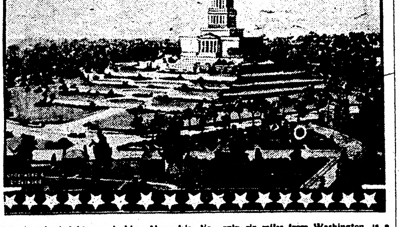
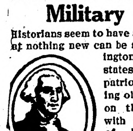
Great Masonic Testimonial



Rising on the heights overlooking Alexandria, Va., only six miles from Washington, is a $4,000,000 memorial to George Washington, testimonial of the Masonic fraternity to a noted fellow member. The tiered temple is surrounded by 35 acres of land and surmounts the uppermost of seven terraces. The building will stand 235 feet high. The main building is 177⅓ feet wide by 195½ feet long. New Hampshire pink granite predominates in the construction. The foundation contains 9,000 cubic feet of concrete reinforced by 720 tons of steel. When completed the memorial will be visible for many miles. The land on which it stands was owned by the Father of His Country and was once selected by Jefferson and Madison and favored by John Adams as the site for the national capital.

Hailed as First Military Genius



Historians seem to have acknowledged at nothing new can be said on Washington's character, statesmanship or patriotism. Nothing old can be said on these subjects with much chance of being better phrased than Byron's immortal summary of him:

The first, the last, the best,
The Cincinnatus of the West,
Whom envy dared not hate:

or Kipling's more detailed presentment in "If." But in spite of all that has been written on the man, few students have taken Washington's full measure as a soldier, and fewer still realize how far he prefigured the scientific and industrial age in which we are living today.

The average person thinks of a great general as one who commands a great army. It would be possible to get farther from the truth than that, but not without prolonged effort. There is a point at which the mere size of an army taxes the genius of its commander; but that point was not reached until the Twentieth century. Judged by the real test, that of achievement in proportion to means and obstacles, Washington is one of the four or five greatest commanders produced by the English-speaking race; probably the greatest.

Greatly Handicapped.

Consider his difficulties. To begin with, he was serving a revolutionary committee, not a real government; and was not backed by any of the governmental powers which supported European commanders. The congress of that day could not levy taxes, could not enforce conscription, could not pay its men or provide supplies. The men were enlisted for varying terms, almost always for short terms. The officers had little training. The different colonies were unaccustomed to act together. There was only the beginning of a national feeling and national consciousness, and the British, whatever their weaknesses, had splendidly disciplined troops and held the sea.

Yet, in the face of obstacles like these, Washington kept an army together and made headway against the enemy until he could deal the finishing blow at Yorktown. The skill with which he nailed Clinton to New York while the Continental army was making its 400-mile march to catch Cornwallis at Yorktown is fully equal to that by which Napoleon caught General Mack asleep at Ulm.

No Errors Mar Record.

On one point of military genius, indeed, Washington is superior even to the Corsican Caesar, who in all things else ranks at the head of the martial world. No man can put his fingers on any point in Washington's campaigns and say: "Here this man made a serious mistake." The soundness of his judgment was almost uncanny.

Perhaps this judgment was due in some measure to the scientific quality of his mind. His approach to science was more practical than that of Franklin, but equally zealous. Washington conducted experiment after experiment in drainage, crop rotation, different methods of fertilizing. His notes on these matters are worthy of attention from agricultural colleges today. He berated Virginia's dependence on tobacco as bitterly as, more than a century later, statesmen lashed the dependence of the Gulf states on cotton.

Always seeking better and more economical methods of production, always trying to utilize by-products, always ready for a "flyer" in land, which was the Eighteenth century substitute for industrial promotion, Washington was startlingly modern in many aspects of his mind. Where this modernism fails, it might pay us to get closer to the Washingtonian viewpoint even at the cost of being somewhat old fashioned.

> George Washington, who is well known to be first in war, first in peace, may also be described as first in the ranks of American road builders. In his trips to the frontier he not only surveyed the courses, later to be followed by roads, but he actually cut his way through the forested hills and mountains to western Virginia and Pennsylvania.

Washington as a Mason

George Washington joined Fredericksburg lodge, No. 4, Fredericksburg, Va., in 1752. Dual or plural membership was common in old lodges at that time as it is today in some British lodges. Washington was also a member of Alexandria lodge No. 39, which was chartered by the Grand lodge of Pennsylvania but transferred to the jurisdiction of Virginia in 1788. George Washington is named as the first worshipful master of this lodge under the new charter.

Project That Failed

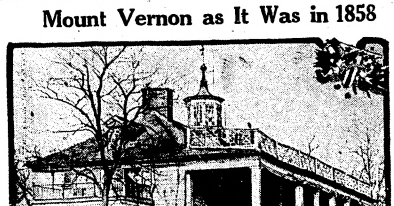
George Washington, in his will, created a fund to establish a university. Shares of the James River and Potomac River Canal company, with a par value of upward of $200,000, had been bestowed upon him by the legislature of Virginia, to be held for public uses, and this sum, he believed, would form a beginning for a national university in the national capital. His wish has not been fulfilled, however, as the securities set aside for the purpose greatly depreciated in value.

Ranks With Noblest

Thoroughly human, absolutely fearless, conqueror of himself, we may put George Washington's record under the microscope of criticism and yet say, with the English historian: "No nobler figure ever stood in the forefront of a nation's history."

> Washington—a fixed star in the firmament of great names, shining without twinkling or obscuration, with clear, beneficent light.—Daniel Webster.

Mount Vernon as It Was in 1858



Of unusual interest is this picture of Washington's home on the west bank of the Potomac river at Mount Vernon in Fairfax county, Va., as it looked in 1858 when it was bought by the Ladies' Mount Vernon association. Slaves owned by the Washington family are seen on the veranda. After 115 years of use (home having been built by Lawrence Washington, George Washington's grandfather, in 1743) the Washington mansion even in 1858, when this picture was made, was badly in need of repairs.

JUDITH KINCH sat before her door with eyes shaded by her hand, looking anxiously down the trail. She was awaiting the first appearance of Zack and Betty, her boy and girl, who had gone to town early that morning. Zack was fourteen and Betty eleven and since the death of Sam, her husband, the three had had hard work to eke a living out of the worn-out mountain farm. But Judith was brave and the children had stood nobly by her. This year their potato crop had been unusually abundant and owing to the fact that much rain had fallen in the lowlands and her little farm being on the side of a steep hill, which afforded wonderful drainage, Judith was hopeful that her potatoes would bring a high price. Not that she wished others to suffer loss, but usually her potatoes were poor on account of lack of moisture.

This morning, bright and early, Zack and Betty, with the help of their mother, had loaded the first load of their precious crop onto the old farm wagon and hitching the mules to the rig had taken them to the town to sell. Judith would have gone too, only she could not bear the jolting of the heavy wagon. Now, at four o'clock in the afternoon, she sat listening for the first rumbling sound which would apprise her of the fact that her children were returning to her.

As Judith sat waiting she unconsciously reviewed her life. First there had been her girlhood spent in an eastern state and then her courtship and marriage to Sam Kinch, who, as a young man promised much and as a husband failed to fulfill that promise. How his roving disposition had finally landed them on top of this high mountain far from neighbors and friends and so poor that there had been little more than a bare living and then, when they had been about to give up and go back East, Sam had been seized with some unaccountable malady from which, after a lingering illness that lasted for several months, he had finally died and left her with debts and two young children. Judith sighed as she thought of all this, not so much for herself as for Zack and Betty. It was too bad that they should not have their chance. They were both bright children and would take readily to education and with the proper training would soon be able to extricate them all from this state of poverty. But where was the money to come from? If all went well the money and credit from the potato crop would barely keep them through the coming winter, which every sign indicated would be a hard one, but just here Judith caught the first rumble of the wagon and, arising, went slowly forward to meet it.

Judith sent a "Hoo-hoo!" down the trail in response to the shrill whistle that always announced Zack's approach, and after a few moments the creaking old wagon came into view. But instead of just Zack and Betty on the high seat there was a third person, a small and slender boyish figure, who sat between her children and seemed to have some difficulty in accommodating himself to the jolting wagon. As they drew up in front of where Judith was standing she noted the gleaming pallor of the boyish face that looked eagerly down at her. Why, he was only a boy! Not many years older than Zack.

"Mother!" cried Zack, "we've brought you company."

"I am real glad," answered Judith in her hearty way. "Get right down and come into the house. You must be all jiggled to pieces on that high seat."

The boy got slowly down and Judith was alarmed to see how thin and frail he was as he came to her with outstretched hand.

"I know you are Mrs. Kinch," the boy said. "I am Albert Corday. I have been staying down in the village with Doctor Britt, but he said I must get higher up in these mountains and when he saw your young folks he asked them if they would bring me up here for a few days. He said he would be up soon to see how I was getting along and to tell you that he would make everything all right when he came."

"Of course it will be all right," said Judith. "Come right this way. Wouldn't you like to lie down and rest a while before supper?" and she led the way to the house without waiting for a reply.

At the supper table Albert seemed to be rested and was able to give an account of himself. He was a student in a near-by college and had studied too hard. A bad cold he had contracted in the early spring had refused to be shaken off and he had been obliged to leave college and seek some place where he could be out of doors the better part of the day. His parents were dead and he was under the guardianship of an old uncle who was so absorbed with his own business affairs that he had scant time to look after his nephew.

"I get very lonely at times," Albert said, "and when Doctor Britt called in your son and asked him to bring me up here—why—why I was awfully glad, you know."

"Well, I am glad you came," Judith said in her motherly way, "and I hope you will make yourself perfectly at home and I am sure Zack will find it mighty nice to have a young fellow around that he can talk to."

A week later Doctor Britt appeared in company with Albert's uncle, who was an elderly man, brusk in manner but nevertheless showing a great fondness for his nephew. He looked sharply at Albert and then turning to Doctor Britt said:

"Why, doctor, Albert looks a different person. It must be this mountain air. What say, Doc?" he said turning to the doctor.

"I say it's the mountain air, too," said Doctor Britt. "It is wonderful. It is clean, pure and invigorating. I have noticed every time I make the trip up here that I feel better for days. I was glad, Mr. Jackson, when you sent Albert to me for I was looking for just the right case to experiment on. And you can see for yourself what it has done already. In a month he will be pretty sound and in three months, if I am not mistaken, he will be a well boy again. I have two other people right now I would be glad to have up here," the doctor said, turning to Judith. "I would send a nurse with them and have them stay a part of the winter up here. Could you manage it, do you suppose?"

"Why, I don't know," stammered Judith, but before she could frame a refusal the thought of what she was owing Doctor Britt, who had been so kind to Sam and who had not worried her about the doctor bill, came to her and she could think of nothing to say except:

"Why, doctor, could anyone live up here just the way we are doing?"

"Well," said the doctor, "if you would let me send a carpenter and have a wide porch put on the south side of the house and tack up some awning, I should say they would get along fine. We could set up some cots because, of course, I should want them to sleep and rest out in the open as much as possible. And as for pay, why, Mrs. Kinch, I can assure you at least $40 a week for each patient I send up here. Take time, however, to think it over, for I will be up the last of the week to see Albert again, and then you can give me your answer."

And that was how Judith's fortunes changed for the better. Her little house was filled to overflowing and two or three little shacks were built to accommodate the sick people Doctor Britt sent up the mountain for Judith to care for. She had to employ extra help, but she herself always gave her personal attention to every one of her guests. She was housekeeper, mother and comforter to them all.

Zack and Betty procured wonderful educations and went forth to battle with the world, well equipped physically and mentally, but Judith preferred to stay on her high mountain and cause the wilderness to blossom like a rose.

Camel Living Fossil, Says Gobi Explorer

A camel is an impossible sort of creature in every way. Nothing about him is like an ordinary respectable animal. To me, writes Roy Chapman Andrews in the Saturday Evening Post, he seems to be a living fossil, a relic of the Pleistocene. Thus, when he sheds his winter's wool, it comes off in great strips and patches, making him look like an animated moth eaten carpet.

We found that our camels of the central Asiatic expedition shed at just about the normal rate at which we collected fossils, so when we needed packing material we simply pulled a yard or two off some camel whose wool was ready for plucking. But one must not be too careless about removing his overcoat, otherwise the beast will catch cold and die.

In spite of his size he is a very delicate animal—or thinks he is. If he has a tiny cut in one of his great flat footpads he will cry and moan like a baby. The Mongol's remedy for such an emergency is simple. The camel is thrown, his legs crossed and he is tied so tightly that he cannot move. Then a piece of leather is sewn over the cut, as one would patch a garment. It looks like a barbarous operation, but is no more painful than shoeing is to a horse.

The camel's only food is the sagebrush and thorny Gobi vegetation. He would not eat green grass if he had it. It would make him ill. The drier, the thornier and stiffer a plant is the better it agrees with him. The peculiarities of camels would fill a book.

Jealousy Does It

"Monsieur," a Chicago woman said to him, "you are wrong in your claim that men are better dressmakers than women."

"But women prefer men dressmakers," the man dressmaker said.

"Yes, that is true."

"Yet the women are better?"

"Yes, they are."

"Well, why don't you women go to them, then?"

The Chicago woman laughed.

"Would you," she said, "ask the enemy how to win the war?"

Snuff Users Increase

The days when snuff was fashionable, when gentlemen—and sometimes ladies—carried it in ornamented boxes of gold or silver, may have passed out with the Civil war, but the use of snuff itself has increased more than 1,200 per cent since that time.

In spite of the growing use of cigarettes, the snuff consumption of the United States, according to figures published in the Farm Journal, has mounted from 4,000,000 pounds to 51,000,000 pounds annually in 50 years. It is estimated that one-tenth of the population use the preparation.

The owl symbolized one of the gods of the Mayans. Among the Syrians the dove was the holiest of birds. Sacred doves are said to be kept at Mecca today. In Russia the peasants call the dove the bird of the Holy Ghost.

WHAT DR. CALDWELL LEARNED IN 47 YEARS PRACTICE

A physician watched the results of constipation for 47 years, and believed that no matter how careful people are of their health, diet and exercise, constipation will occur from time to time. Of next importance, then, is how to treat it when it comes. Dr. Caldwell always was in favor of getting as close to nature as possible, hence his remedy for constipation, known as Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, is a mild vegetable compound. It can not harm the system and is not habit forming. Syrup Pepsin is pleasant-tasting, and youngsters love it.

Dr. Caldwell did not approve of drastic physics and purges. He did not believe they were good for anybody's system. In a practice of 47 years he never saw any reason for their use when Syrup Pepsin will empty the bowels just as promptly.

Do not let a day go by without a bowel movement. Do not sit and hope, but go to the nearest druggist and get one of the generous bottles of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, or write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. BB, Monticello, Illinois, for free trial bottle.

A Question

Speaking of which came first, the chicken or the egg, we never have been able positively to make up our mind which New Year's resolution is broken first, ours not to drop any more trifling little smidgens of tobacco on the sitting room rug or a certain noble woman's not to show any feeling in the matter even if we did.—Ohio State Journal.

The Germ Received

A man came alone to the neighbor's house on an errand.

"Why didn't you bring the wife along and spend the evening?" asked the friend.

"Oh, she has caught the germ again," replied the disgruntled husband.

"Flu, I suppose?" said the solicitous neighbor.

"No, the malady is gardenitis. She received a new seed catalogue today," was the distressed husband's lament.

Help Kidneys By Drinking More Water

Take Salts to Flush Kidneys and Help Neutralize Irritating Acids

Kidney and bladder irritations often result from acidity, says a noted authority. The kidneys help filter this acid from the blood and pass it on to the bladder, where it may remain to irritate and inflame, causing a burning, scalding sensation, or setting up an irritation at the neck of the bladder, obliging you to seek relief two or three times during the night. The sufferer is in constant dread; the water passes sometimes with a scalding sensation and is very profuse; again, there is difficulty in voiding it.

Bladder weakness, most folks call it because they can't control urination. While it is extremely annoying and sometimes very painful, this is often one of the most simple ailments to overcome. Begin drinking lots of soft water, also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from your pharmacist and take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast. Continue this for two or three days. This will help neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer are a source of irritation to the bladder and urinary organs, which then act normal again.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, and is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and is used by thousands of folks who are subject to urinary disorders caused by acid irritation. Jad Salts causes no bad effects whatever.

"I was not thinking of your first mistake, I was thinking of your second one—the gentleman you speak of as Gray Eyes."

"But he's nothing—"

"Naturally you'd say so. And I do believe that he is nothing to you now, but he must have been at some time, although he, too, takes the more than a little absurd position that his interest in you is purely altruistic. Frankly, I don't believe either him or yourself in this connection, and you might as well know it soon as late."

"Then the reason you're going to marry Miss Pringle is that you believe me to be involved in some sort of an affair with Gray Eyes?"

"No, that's not the reason."

"Then it's [illegible] of my former—"

"No, that isn't it, either. You are in no way to blame; it's just my own sheer cussedness." He seemed a little uncertain of his course now, a little ashamed of himself. Lolita leaned forward sympathetically.

"Tell me all about it, Mr. Warrill," she begged.

"Well," he began, heartened by her tone, "it's like this. Please try to understand. I have been, as you know, for some years writing for the magazines. I'm getting nowhere. The stuff that I write is cheap commercial drivel, written for a price—I can do better than that, I know. I want a chance to do the very best work that I am capable of, and by marrying Miss Pringle I can do it. She has promised me that I shall not have to worry over financial considerations at all. I shall have a big study to work in, infinite time, and no responsibilities; no necessity for turning out cheap stuff in order to make a living; no necessity for writing advertising copy for the papers that advertise theaters by way of so-called play reviews. Do you see my point? Last night I thought that I would give up the idea, and marry, but, but—" She stopped him.

"Yes, I do," returned Lolita slowly; "I think that you are hopeless. Much as I care for you, I cannot help but think less of you now."

"But you're perfectly silly. Why should you think less of me? You're taking a sentimental view of this whole thing. Your mind is full of the contemporary cant in this country; the French, with their broader contemplation of the moralities, would think nothing of such an arrangement; and, besides, it will be a help to you. I love you, and shall always love you more than anyone else in the world. This will give me a chance to be of some help to you, too, while you are learning to write. I can help you financially, after I've married Miss Pringle."

"Do you think for one minute I'd accept such help from you under those circumstances?"

"You accepted it from Gray Eyes, did you not?"

"But that's very different."

"Different. I think it is much worse, considering the fact that you do not love him. Either way, considering that, you are doing something very small. If you do not intend to make him any return for his money, you are cheating him; if you do intend to, you are lowering yourself, since you admittedly do not love him."

"Then you think that if I let you help me financially, and made some sort of return to you, considering the fact that we love each other, it would be all right, despite Miss Pringle, despite the conventions, despite all of the decencies?"

"There is another phase to the thing, Lolita, that you overlook. We are artists, and therefore not to be bound down by the ordinary conventions that the herd observes. The greatest thing in the world is the ability to create beauty. Those who have that ability, as you and I have, in a measure, should be, and by plain right are exempted from the observance of the conventions that the Babbitts are dedicated to. The creation of beauty is the highest possible form that man's endeavor can take. We should let no petty considerations of any kind interfere with our attempt to do so. I am not alone in this view; almost all of the great, for hundreds of years, have agreed that this is so."

"Regardless of that, I don't believe it, I shan't accept the theory, and there is utterly no use in your presenting that fast and loose argument to me. I've started out to make something of myself—and if I do it, I'm going to do it on the 'American plan.'"

"Then, the whole fact of the matter is that you simply don't love me—isn't it?" Before this question Lolita sat silent. The whole fact of the matter was that she did love him, mightily, and it was all that she could do to hold to her determination to win out in the right way or not at all. Her heart was breaking at the thought that he could for one moment consider marrying Miss Pringle for her money.

"I do love you," she said at last in a tone hardly audible.

He rose and crossed to her chair, took both of her hands in his own, pulled her to her feet. Almost brutally he kissed her, and, brutal as the kiss was she gloried in it, for she felt somehow certain that he would never kiss Miss Pringle like that. For a moment she abandoned herself to his kisses and his lips searched her face, her throat, even her bosom.

"Oh, Mr. Warrill, you do love me," she said softly, "drop this mad idea of marrying Miss Pringle—you and I can manage somehow. I'll go without anything, everything. We can work our problem of life out together, and then, if we ever get anywhere, we will have done so by our own efforts cleanly. Please say you will."

"No," he said roughly; "I know what all that means, and I won't drag you through it; you're too beautiful to be marred by the ugly contacts with life that that might call for. Let me make it easy for both of us—please." Suddenly he picked her up bodily and started to carry her across the room.

For one moment delicious resignation took hold of her senses; it was wonderful to be picked up and carried off that way. He laid her down, and she could feel his hot breath upon her as he bent over her, and while every fiber of her being called out for surrender she yet fought back, sat up, pushed him away, stood erect, the tears rolling from her eyes as she saw the expression upon his face—one of such passion that it was horrible.

"Leave the room," she ordered.

He grasped her in his arms again, but with every ounce of strength in her body she fought him off and pushed him away, marveling that she was able to do it despite the fact that she loved him no less for what had nearly transpired.

"If you dare to touch me again," she told him earnestly, "I'll call for help." This sobered him, and he stepped back, his face flushed and angry.

"You haven't always been so particular," he reminded her.

"No," she agreed.

"If you loved me a little more—" he began.

"If I loved you a little less," she denied, "you would have had a better chance of succeeding. As it is, I want you to go, and I do not want you ever to come near me again until you have changed."

"And if I do not change?"

"Then I never want to see you again—ever."

"You mean that?"

"Absolutely."

"Lolita, you're superb."

She did not reply to this. Sitting upon the bed she covered her face with her hands and cried frankly and openly.

"You almost make me change my mind," he said sadly; "but I can't very well now, I can only hope that you will change yours. I think it's big of you to take this position, and all that; still, by and large, it's foolish—and because it is foolish, I think you'll get over it. I'm going now, but I'm coming back soon, and I want you to think things over and try and see them from my viewpoint." She did not reply; and, after a moment, he went to the door, passed through, and presently Lolita heard his feet descending the stairs—for the last time, she reflected. In an agony of torment she threw her slim body full length upon the bed and shook with sobs, realizing, now, that she didn't really want him to go, that, if it were possible to call him back she would accede to his wishes in everything, rather than lose him forever. Yet, as she lay there sobbing, little voices inside of her kept telling her approving, heartening things. At last she sat up dry eyed, thinking intently. For once and for all, under the most trying circumstances imaginable, she had proved to herself that she was able to withstand temptation. The easiest way had been most alluring from every standpoint, yet she had turned from it. A great truth seemed to dawn upon her as she sat there, still as a statue, staring at her reflection in the dresser glass: a misstep in life did not disqualify one but merely made it harder for one to fight and win the ultimate battle. Beyond a doubt, the battle just won was a most decisive one. Things would be different now.

She jumped up, and, though it was late, pulled a trunk out of the closet and opened it. Busily she flew about the room putting her things into it. She would leave the neighborhood, break away from everything and make her own way. When she had succeeded—if she succeeded, she would pay back Gray Eyes every cent that he had spent upon her.

Deep down inside of her, she knew, had been born a new strength of character, a new determination stronger, finer, firmer than ever before, and it was this knowledge that made her happy, even as the additional knowledge that she had not stopped loving Warrill and probably never would, made her sad. Forcing thoughts of him from her mind she continued to pack. In the morning she would lose herself so that neither Warrill nor Gray Eyes could possibly find her, and, from that time on, fight her own battle.

In the morning Lolita rose still fully determined to carry out her resolution of the night before. It was a cold, raw, drizzly, typical Chicago day and not one likely to lift the spirits.

When she was dressed, Mrs. Hardy came in with the mail.

"Well, well, why so ambitious this morning?" asked that lady in her usual cheery manner.

"I'm going to leave you," returned Lolita, with sincere regret.

"Not really?"

"Yes, really. I want to get away from everyone, make my own way. I've let people help me out plenty long enough. If the man with the gray eyes wants to know where I've gone, don't tell him anything about me one way or another. Just say I will return what he has spent on me—as soon as I can, I'll take it out there to that roadhouse that he seems to have something to do with."

Mrs. Hardy looked genuinely sad.

"Well, I'm sure sorry to see you go, girlie; yet, I really believe that you're taking the right step. If you ever get into a jam, or there's anything I can possibly do for you, don't hesitate to call me up or drop me a line. Here's your mail—looks like another check—thin envelope." Lolita took the envelope, and Mrs. Hardy went out after repeating her promise to be of aid if needed.

Opening the envelope, Lolita found a check for $90 from a magazine, for another "confession" story she had written—the only story she had had out in the mails; she need not leave a forwarding address.

Lolita succeeded, with a generous tip, in inducing a taxi driver to allow her trunks, of which she had two, to go into the taxi with her. This obviated the necessity of calling an expressman, which would have made it easier for anyone who wished to trace her.

"Drive to the Wilson avenue 'L' station," she directed him, "and get me a morning paper."

After he had made a stop for the paper she told him to drive south. While he did she hurriedly glanced through the paper. There was a classified ad, extolling the desirability of a room for rent near the park. . . . This somewhat interested her and she gave the chauffeur the address.

Presently they arrived before the number, which was just about a quarter of a block from Lincoln park, and Lolita alighted from the taxi, told the driver to wait, and approached a gray stone front house very dignified and pleasant looking though she could see that it was a rather old building. She rang the bell and presently a woman with a dust cap on came to the door.

"I'd like to see the room you have for rent," stated Lolita.

"Awrl," replied the lady lazily and led her to a room on the second floor. It was a much smaller room than the one she had had at Mrs. Hardy's, but Lolita reflected that doubtless it was much cheaper and, beside, it had a bay window where she could put her typewriter upon a table and look into the park as she wrote.

Hard to Account for Whims of Collectors

When Whistler was hard pressed for money he took many of his etchings to the pawnbroker to obtain the wherewith to buy wine or rare Nankin china, being a connoisseur of the former and a collector of the latter says the Market for Exchange.

Rossetti devoted himself to old furniture and Japanese bric-a-brac with the passion of the true collector. Unlike Whistler, however, he knew how to hang on to money and drove a hard bargain. His house was a combined museum and menagerie where raccoons, armadillos, salamanders and chameleons rummaged among rare manuscripts, books, pictures, musical instruments and furniture. The raccoon was finally disposed of after he had nibbled up some of the poet's manuscript, and a zebra which in the end proved dangerous met the same fate. There is, however, no accounting for tastes; and the collector who specialized in nooses which had performed their duty and to which he attached the names of their tenants possessed, if not a more peculiar, certainly a more morbid taste than Rossetti.

Preserving Corn Meal

Since corn meal spoils rather easily, special attention should be given to the way in which it is stored. It should be kept in a cool, dry place and should be closely covered to exclude insects. This applies to the mill and the shop as well as the home. The water-ground meal spoils more easily than the granular meal. When convenient, therefore, it should be milled only in small quantities as needed.

Utilizing Lettuce

It has got so they serve nearly everything on a leaf of lettuce except a subpena.—Buffalo Blade.

MY FAVORITE STORIES

By IRVIN S. COBB

The Final Bang

IN ORDER that the point of this story may be made clear, a word or two of preliminary explanation is required. Arthur Hopkins—one of the most successful of the younger group of theatrical producers, is a squarely built little man, not more than five feet six inches in height and with rather an emphatic way of speaking. It is characteristic of him that once he has made up his mind to a thing, he acts upon his decision with dispatch; nor, when he expresses himself, is there ever any doubt as to his exact meaning.

A season or so back, he put on rather an expensive play for a tryout before bringing it into New York. The production did not seem to go very well on the road. Nevertheless, the members of the cast, with the proverbial optimism of actor-folk, were hopeful that business might pick up and that, once they reached the big town, the piece might have a successful run.

But back in the home office Hopkins took a different view of the prospects. He ran through the figures of the box office reports, as sent in by the road manager, and immediately wired the latter to cancel all further bookings, pay the members of the company the required two weeks' salary, and ship the scenery and the properties back to the storehouse. Considerably disappointed at this outcome, the troupers returned to the city to look for new engagements. Naturally, Hopkins' action in so abruptly withdrawing the production became the subject of common gossip in the theatrical district.

A few days later, Wilton Lackaye was in the Lambs' club. An aspiring dramatist approached him.

"Say, Lackaye," he began, "maybe you can help me out. My latest comedy has just gone into rehearsals. It looks pretty good, too—everybody seems to like it; but we're shy a good gag line for the last act. You know how it helps, sometimes, if you bring the final curtain down with a wallop. I've racked my brain but I can't think of anything. I'm hoping maybe you can help me. If you've got time, I'll tell you briefly what the concluding scene is like and perhaps that'll give you an inspiration."

"I don't think you need to do all that," said Lackaye, softly. "If I get you, what you want is something short and snappy to close a new show with?"

"That's it."

"All right," said Lackaye, "here it is in two words: 'Arthur Hopkins'!"

The Purification of Johnson Sides

JOHNSON SIDES, official peacemaker of the Piutes in Nevada, one cold January night got lost in a snowstorm and was induced by a cowboy who found him to take a long swig out of a whisky bottle. This was Johnson's first offense and it tipped him over completely. In a delirium he walked into a burial place and staggered through the musty portals of an ancient and abandoned tomb. There he lay down to sleep it off. The chilly temperature sobered him up. He returned to Carson the next morning penitent and terrified at having broken the law.

The legislature happened to be in session. A humorously inclined member got hold of the Indian, heard his story, and drew up a bill as follows:

"SENATE BILL 6521.

"Section I—Be it enacted that the drink taken by Johnson Sides in the Carson City graveyard Monday night, January 3rd, be hereby declared null and void.

"Section II—This act shall go into effect immediately upon its passage and approval by the governor."

With much pomp and panoply and with great wads of red sealing wax and a mass of red ribbon affixed to the document, this hoax was solemnly passed by the senate without a dissenting vote, then was taken to the assembly and there passed unanimously, and after the governor had signed it the precious paper was bestowed upon Johnson with an elaborate speech. He took the document to the outskirts of the town where his tribe was encamped, translated it and announced that the White Father had called the big souse off.

The next morning 36 drunken Piutes were gathered up out of the cemetery by the local constabulary.

Borrowed From the Romans

"The Rush," a Roman sign, gave rise to the Latin proverb which, translated is "Good wine needs no bush." It is taken from the Roman custom of suspending a bush over the house front to denote that wine could be obtained from within. It was adopted by English tavern keepers in the Middle ages.

Watch Acts as Calendar

An oblong wristlet watch made recently measures only one inch by one and one-half. It records not only the time, but, in addition, the day of the week, the month, the date, and the phases of the moon. The last four records are contained in small circles on the dial.

When Food Sours

Lots of folks who think they have "indigestion" have only an acid condition which could be corrected in five or ten minutes. An effective anti-acid like Phillips Milk of Magnesia soon restores digestion to normal.

Phillips does away with all that sourness and gas right after meals. It prevents the distress so apt to occur two hours after eating. What a pleasant preparation to take! And how good it is for the system! Unlike a burning dose of soda—which is but temporary relief at best—Phillips Milk of Magnesia neutralizes many times its volume in acid.

Next time a hearty meal, or too rich a diet has brought on the least discomfort, try—

HAD TO WORK TOO HARD

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Gave Her Strength

Mt. Carmel, Pa.—"After my second baby was born I had to work too hard and be on my feet too soon because my husband was ill. After his death I was in such a weakened and run-down condition that nothing seemed to help me. I am starting the fourth bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and feel a great deal better. I am much stronger and don't get so tired out when I wash or work hard. I do housekeeping and dressmaking and I highly recommend the Vegetable Compound as a tonic. I am willing to answer any letters I receive asking about it."—MRS. GERTRUDE BUTTS, 414 S. Market, Mt. Carmel, Pa.

It May Be Urgent

When your Children Cry for It

Castoria is a comfort when Baby is fretful. No sooner taken than the little one is at ease. If restless, a few drops soon bring contentment. No harm done, for Castoria is a baby remedy, meant for babies. Perfectly safe to give the youngest infant; you have the doctors' word for that! It is a vegetable product and you could use it every day. But it's in an emergency that Castoria means most. Some night when constipation must be relieved—or colic pains—or other suffering. Never be without it; some mothers keep an extra bottle, unopened, to make sure there will always be Castoria in the house. It is effective for older children, too; read the book that comes with it.

SANDWICH FILLINGS

EVERY mother has many occasions to use sandwich fillings and a variety of ideas will be of help. It is a good plan to keep a list of good combinations, for often the makings are at hand and they are forgotten. Here is a good one: Chop fine two large sardines, one cupful of cold boiled ham and two cucumber pickles. Make a paste by adding a tablespoonful of mayonnaise. Spread on thinly sliced, buttered white bread.

Take one pint of finely chopped chicken, turkey or game, one-half cupful of ground almonds blanched, mix with mayonnaise dressing, adding a little cream. Spread on buttered brown bread.

Chop enough olives and mix with mayonnaise dressing to spread on the number of sandwiches to serve.

Chop equal quantities of veal, tongue or chicken, moisten with stock from the meat, season well and add scraped onion, a grating of nutmeg, mix well and spread on graham bread.

Neufchatel cheese softened with a little cream, adding nuts, makes a delicious filling. Use one-half the quantity of pecans, a few chopped olives and spread on buttered brown bread.

The coarse breads, using the whole wheat and corn when possible, are the best of breads for children, for it gives the teeth and gums the proper exercise in mastication to keep them healthy.

To one cupful of ground ham, add two cupfuls of chicken, one green pepper, finely chopped and mix with mayonnaise. Use on buttered graham bread. Soften cream cheese with cream and spread on whole wheat bread. Cover with a little chopped candied ginger.

Crisp lettuce leaves dipped in French dressing and served at once makes dainty and tasty sandwich filling.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

EAGLESTONES

THE idea of an eaglestone being a good luck talisman is easily traceable to the Greeks, whose ancient writers frequently mention it. The stone is a variety of argillaceous oxide of iron, found generally in masses the size of a walnut, is hollow and has in it a movable kernel. The Greeks called them eaglestones from the belief that the eagle transported them to her nest to facilitate the laying of eggs. Sir Thomas Browne, in his "Vulgar Errors" (1646), speaks of the eaglestone as having medicinal properties ascribed to it by the ignorant. In these days the carrying about of an eaglestone in one's pocket is supposed to bring good luck. Not long ago an English paper stated that John D. Rockefeller, who is not generally considered to be of a superstitous turn of mind, habitually carries about with him an eaglestone "for luck." This connecting up of the Oracle of Delphi with oil is certainly interesting and if the statement regarding Mr. Rockefeller is true in his case the eaglestone seems to have "worked to a charm."

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"IN HIS TRACKS"

"THEY followed in his tracks" would be said today about anyone who was followed or pursued. It might be in a big city that the way lay, through streets and over pavements that would show no tracks. Not so, however, the early travels in which the phrase had its origin.

The expression "in his tracks" and "making tracks" comes to us from the Far West, where not so long ago men literally did blaze trails and make tracks.

The specific circumstance in which the latter phrase was first used was when a squatter deserted his claim and set out to explore an unknown region. Then it was said that he was "making tracks"; and the expression, though no longer literal, has survived in our language until this day.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

By DOUGLAS MALLOCH

HE NEVER told a single lie,
George Washington. And that is why
They made him President, they did.
And yet my Pa says any kid
Can be a President some day,
But not a kid lives out our way
A President could ever be—
Not even me.

You ought to always tell the truth,
Pa says, especially in youth,
And that is what I try to do.
And yet they blame so much on you,
And ask about the pantry shelf,
So what's the use to blame yourself?
For who would own right up right then?
Not even men.

He must have been a funny one,
A funny man, George Washington.
I've thought about the men I know,
I've thought about an hour or so,
To find the man my father meant,
The kind that could be President,
And not a one I ever saw—
Not even Pa.

SOMETHING TO THINK ABOUT

By F. A. WALKER

YOUR INCENTIVE

FOUR things, one or more of them, furnish the incentive for 99 per cent of men's endeavor—fame, wealth, position, power.

One thing furnishes the incentive for almost all women—love.

Aspiration to realize one or more of the quartet of achievements begins early in everybody's life.

The desire to win the most valuable marbles is only a demonstration of the desire to attain wealth as it is represented by "glassys" or "agates."

What marbles are to the boy, dollars or bonds or wide fields or some other evidence of wealth will be to the man.

The position the bully would possess as the "boss" of the school or of his associates is only the youth index of what the man would achieve whose greatest desire is for power.

The youthful bully may be a good natured boy and the man may be an "easy boss." They are one and the same thing except in years and maturity.

Men will be dishonest to gain wealth. They will risk the penalties of the law to gain fame. They will sacrifice to the limit to gain power. But they will do all three and more to gain position.

And what they would give most for is the most flimsy and treacherous possession of all.

A man honest in everything else will adopt the tactics of the dark lantern and the jimmy to gain political preferment and attain official position.

The social climber will bear almost any insult and practice almost any servility if by either or both one step may be gained to win that social recognition which is his overwhelming desire.

The groundwork of all these aspirations and the endeavor to make them into realities is ambition.

Without ambition we would go through life like snails, creeping and crawling towards a dismal end.

With a selfish ambition we would ride rough shod and heartlessly over every person and thing which blocked or threatened to block our path.

Neither career contributes to happiness here or hereafter; neither makes us better, in ourselves, nor helps us to contribute to the betterment of the world in general.

It is unselfish ambition, the desire to have wealth for the good we may do with it; position for the opportunity it gives to influence our fellow beings to be bigger and better; fame for the means it gives for the wider spreading of the real truths of life; power for the measure of good that it makes possible; by these does ambition change from a vice to a virtue and cease to be the sin by which Shakespeare tells us the angels fell.

There is but little space, too little to give it its just deserts, to say a word of that chiefest of woman's incentives, love.

Love is the only power on earth which can create something out of nothing, can make what only seems to be a living reality, can gild vice until it passes for virtue and makes a heaven out of what would otherwise be a hell.

Every mother in the world does all these things. The love of a mother knows only one great love and that the love which the Bible tells of God Himself.

In the cottage and in the palace love finds an equal place, if there be there a woman to truly express it. It knows no boundary of application, no restraints of expression. Use does not diminish or time exhaust it.

It is greater than fame, more inexhaustible than power and more permanent than position. It is the one attribute of God that establishes our likeness to our creator.

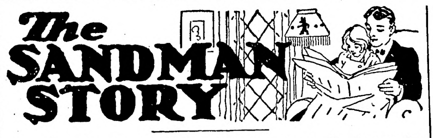
The SANDMAN STORY



ABOUT THE COOKY MAN

"SOON," said the Cooky Man, "I will be eaten."

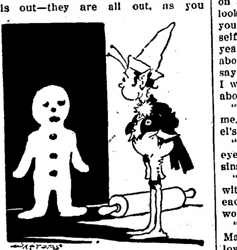
"You take it very calmly," said Billie Brownie.

Billie Brownie had come to call on the Cooky Man for a few moments, as he had been told that the Cooky Man wanted to have others hear this story.

Every one was out of the house, and only the Cooky Man and Billie Brownie were talking.

"You see," said Billie Brownie, "the Queen of the Fairies told me you were going to be all alone and that you would tell me your story, and as I don't like to be seen I came when she said every one would be out."

"Yes," said the Cooky Man, "they are all out. Muriel is walking with her Aunt Marian and Muriel's daddy is out—they are all out, as you heard. They thought it such a beautiful day it was a pity to stay in the house.



"I Must Tell You My Story," Said the Cooky Man.

"And I've no doubt they're right.

"But I didn't care about going out. I was afraid something might happen to me. I might fall down and get dirty, and I wouldn't like that. You see, some could fall down and get dirty and they would come home and get all washed and clean again.

"You can't wash a Cooky Man, though, and so if I fell down and got dirty I mightn't be liked any more, and I most particularly want to be liked.

"You wouldn't think that a creature made of batter would have that much feeling, would you, Billie Brownie?"

"Well," said the Cooky Man, "I must tell you my story, for it explains everything.

"Muriel is a little girl who lives in this house. She is not very old and she is not very young. Of course, I think she is very old—she is so much older than I am. She is over five years old, and when you're only a few hours old five years seem a long time.

"Still she is not so terribly old—I mean such as she would be if she were ten or eleven years old, or something very ancient like that.

"Now I've been made especially for her. Her Aunt Marian was making some biscuits and she said to herself:

"'I'll make some cookies, too, and I will make a special cooky for Muriel.'

"So she made me—making my handsome shape herself. Of course, it's not a perfect shape, but it's pretty handsome, I think.

"Well, you see, I am also dressed up for an occasion. And that occasion is when Muriel shall eat me.

"I have raisins to look like buttons on a suit—they give me a handsome look, don't they, Billie Brownie? And you will forgive me for praising myself up a bit. Others have years and years in which to say nice things about themselves, or else hear others say them, and I've so little time that I want to get in as many nice things about myself as possible.

"Then, too, it is not conceited of me, for I owe all this beauty to Muriel's Aunt Marian.

"As you will notice, too, I have eyes and a nose and a mouth of raisins.

"Don't you think my arms are nice with the five tiny little raisins on each band to show where my fingers would be if I had fingers?"

"I think you're a handsome Cooky Man," said Billie Brownie, "and I love calling upon you, for I've never called upon a Cooky Man before."

"Pray pardon me," said the Cooky Man, "if I don't offer you a little food. I have to save myself for Muriel. And I'm all I have in the way of food, I hope that is clear."

"Quite," agreed Billie Brownie.

"But the story I wanted to tell you was this," said the Cooky Man. "I wanted to tell you that it would be nice if you could send the suggestion about to other aunts and grandmothers and mothers that when they're baking it would be nice to always make a Cooky Man for any little girl or little boy there may be in the house. For, Billie Brownie, a Cooky Man is a treat.

"That is why I am so happy and why I don't mind being eaten. If you're going to be a treat you're only too willing to be eaten—at least, that is what a Cooky Man thinks.

"Hush! There comes Muriel. And now she's to have her Cooky Man. Don't forget to send around the good word, Billie Brownie."

"I won't," said Billie Brownie, as he hurried away.

SINE CERA

SINE CERA, a latin phrase which means, "without wax." It was a phrase used by the Romans when they wished to express the idea that the marble contained no scars and the canvas neither blemish nor cracks. From this phrase has come our English word sincere. Without sincerity, confidence is impossible. Sincerity means truth, whether expressed in testimony, conversation, advertising or character.

Superficiality never accomplished anything worthwhile. Sham and pretense have always led to failure. When you purchase at a furniture store an article reputed to be solid walnut and you discover that it was made of a cheap wood and only veneered with a walnut finish, you immediately return the article and demand your money back. The more serious price however is paid by the dealer himself for the reason that he has lost what later might have proven to be a regular customer, for the reason that you are not likely to deal with him a second time. The progress of the economic world is possible only when the truth is stated; when mutual trust exists. A statement, letter, illustration or representation of any kind that is insincere will always lead to the sacrifice of honor and respect, without which no person can succeed. Confidence cannot be betrayed without wrecking the entire economic system. Remove sincerity from business and we have bankruptcy.

What is true of the world of business relations is also true in the world of friendships and all home life. Without sincerity home and friendship is impossible.

A fine motto—why not give it expression in all our human relationships—sine cera—I will not use wax.

Why We Do What We Do

by M. K. THOMSON, Ph. D.

WHY WE HATE TAXES

MEN have always hated taxes. Taxes have kept bad company. Tribute was collected by force from those who could not defend themselves. What was wrung from the hard hand of peasants was squandered by the overlords on selfish extravagances. The tax gatherer was looked upon as a traitor, a highwayman.

Something of this odium carries over to modern times. We look upon taxes as at best a necessary evil.

Lack of confidence and charges of graft in the administration of public funds have done much to create a feeling of hate for all forms of taxation.

The money we pay in taxes is for the benefit of the whole country or for a district and only indirectly beneficial to us personally. Abstract benefits are less appealing. The good of the community is so vague as compared with a fine suit of clothes, a nice vacation trip, numerous concerts and prizefights, we could get with our money. We make the mistake of assuming that we could get all of these things instead of just one for the price of the tax.

There are so many people involved that we think our money will not be missed. Many otherwise honest people try to get out of paying taxes. Not infrequently they hedge a little and sometimes a whole lot. We are willing to let the other fellow pay the taxes. There is the same peculiar attitude towards large corporations.

Witness the number of honest people who try to cheat the railroad or smuggle goods into the country to avoid duty charges. Taxes come in the same class.

We hate to pay taxes because it hurts to part with a lump sum of money all at once. The best kind of a tax is one that is extracted gradually over a long period and in small installments. The gasoline tax does not frighten anyone. And yet the average driver pays out in the neighborhood of twenty dollars a year. How a man would howl if he was required to pay down twenty dollars a year for road tax!

Lee Birthplace Will Be Shrine

Daughters of Confederacy Pay $240,000 for Old Virginia Estate.

Richmond, Va.—The birthplace of Gen. Robert E. Lee, Stratford Hall, in Westmoreland County, Virginia, has been bought by the William Alexander chapter of the United Daughters of the Confederacy in Connecticut, it was announced here.

The plantation of 1,222 acres, where Lee spent his boyhood years was sold for $240,000 and will be made a national memorial.

Purchase of the Lee estate marks the first step in the plan sponsored by the William Alexander chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy to make the place "not merely a shrine, but a living national educational memorial and a center of historical research," Miss Ethel Armes, of the William Alexander chapter, said.

Sold on Birthday.

Announcement of the sale, on the anniversary of General Lee's birth, and the two hundredth anniversary of the building of historic Stratford hall, marks the fulfillment of a determination born of a dramatic story starting in Greenwich, Conn., nearly a year ago. Mrs. Charles D. Lanier, of Greenwich, head of the William Alexander chapter, while going through an old broken desk of her mother-in-law, Mrs. Sidney Lanier, widow of the poet, came upon a pencilled manuscript by Lanier, unpublished and until then not known to exist, which turned out to be a speech he made before citizens of Macon, Ga., in 1870 upon the death of General Lee in which he urged the establishment of a memorial to honor Lee, to which every person who loved the southern leader could contribute.

The following day Mrs. Lanier received a letter from a friend visiting in Virginia describing a trip to Stratford Hall and asking why it could not be preserved.

The same day Mrs. Lanier called a meeting of her chapter which resulted in the passage of resolutions looking to the purchase of the tract. The deed of purchase was signed at Stratford Hall by the owners, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Stuart, after seven months' negotiations.

Miss Armes set forth the purposes of the Robert E. Lee Memorial foundation, now being formed to operate similarly to the Mount Vernon association, as being fourfold: To purchase, restore and furnish the home; to restore the famous old library, make of it a center of research and to establish scholarships; to restore the colonial gardens, the Stratford wharf on the Potomac and reproduce some of the boats which two centuries ago were tied there; and to perpetuate the ideals and character of the Lees, chiefly by historical studies.

In Good Repair.

The house is in a good state of preservation, Miss Armes said. Insurance agencies have said after inspection that as it stands it might be insured for $100,000. The purchase price is $240,000 for the entire estate, to be paid $50,000 within three months and the balance within three years. The foundation is planning a national campaign for $500,000 to allow $150,000 for restoration and additional funds for building a guest house.

Edward A. Donn, Jr., who has specialized in colonial architecture, has been employed by the Connecticut United Daughters of the Confederacy to supervise the restoration.

Stratford was the gift of Queen Caroline, wife of King George II, to members of the Lee family. It was the home of Richard Henry and Francis Lightfoot Lee, signers of the Declaration of Independence; of "Light Horse Harry" Lee and other generations of the family. Prior to the Revolutionary war it was a gathering place for Virginia leaders and the origin of much of the sentiment for independence.

Baby Picks Name Out of Dad's Hat

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Gene Tunney Odato, only several days old, has named himself. When Mr and Mrs. Patsy Odato of Brentwood, a suburb, sought a name for their off-spring, they ran into so many suggestions that they decided to put it up to the baby himself.

Selecting a score of names of present-day celebrities, they wrote the names on paper slips and put them in a hat. The baby's chubby fist went into the skypiece and reappeared with his name—Gene Tunney.

Farm Woman Wins Seat in State Senate

Hartford, Conn.—Miss Mary B. Weaver, who manages her own extensive farm, Candlewood, in New Milford, is the one woman senator in the Connecticut general assembly.

Miss Weaver is not, however, new to political office. She has served three times in the state house of representatives, is well trained in legislative procedure and committee work, can debate on the floor and run a committee at public hearings.

She summarizes her view of women in politics thus:

"Women are still pioneers in the political field. Nevertheless, they are slowly but surely taking their place in the political world. Already they have aided constructive legislation."

Tires Cost 1-17th of Cent Per Mile

This per-mile cost of tires, based on information collected each year by the research department of the American Automobile association, compares favorably with a cost of 1 cent a mile in 1913 to indicate the advances made in the development of the tire industry.

Three developments the last year are held responsible for part of the reduction—the British government lifted its six-year restriction on the exportation of crude rubber from the Far East rubber plantations under British rule; the American manufacturers succeeded in developing a line of "super" tires, and the rubber manufacturers formed the Rubber Institute, Inc., under Gen. Lincoln C. Andrews.

The end of the curb placed on British crude rubber that could be exported from plantations to world consumers meant that crude rubber prices no longer will be held to high levels artificially. The restriction policy resulted in keeping rubber prices from 26 cents to $1.21 a pound in the intervening period.

Girl Hostess Greets Travelers at Airport

It is her duty to welcome all persons who arrive at the landing field and she receives $100 a week.

Miss Haviland has a large motor car for conveying airplane passengers to their destination in the city. An airplane also is provided for her to fly.

"She won this unique job," explains Guy E. Stanley, president of the airport company, "because of her charming personality and courteous reception of transient and commercial plane passengers."

Miss Haviland is a licensed airplane pilot. She started at the bottom in aviation after a futile attempt to start at the top in a transatlantic flight. She was the persistent young woman who kept the wires hot with telegrams to Commander Richard E. Byrd when he was preparing for his flight to France. Her perseverance won for her the assurance from Byrd that if he took any woman aboard the America it would be Miss Haviland.

Walks in Her Sleep and Robs Neighbor

Senatobia, Miss.—A new defense is set up by attorneys for Julia Jackson, twenty, charged with the theft of $20. They say she did it in her sleep, and the puzzled justice of the peace has taken the case under advisement.

Julia is a somnambulist. She took the money on a wet night and her tracks from the room door to a neighbor's house, a quarter of a mile away and back to her room, were easily traced. She entered the house of a neighbor and took $20 from a pair of trousers that hung on the wall. The money was found in her hand as she slept in her bed about two hours after the theft.

The judge has no doubt she did it while sleeping, but he is wondering what the law is for a case like that.

ALIVE IN SPITE OF LEGAL "DEATH"

Efforts to Correct Error in Register Fail.

Berlin.—Being known to breathe regularly and to eat three square meals a day is not sufficient proof that a person is actually alive. At least, it is no proof for the Hamburg authorities in the case of A. W. Wothke, sailor, who, despite the fact that he has been breathing ever since he was born in 1869, has been dead since 1912, according to the law. More than 16 years ago he was erroneously entered as deceased in the Hamburg city register.

Not even the fact that Wothke has regularly been paying his income tax, which can hardly be expected of a dead man, could induce the authorities to cancel their obviously erroneous entry.

Wothke has been fighting for his life, as it were, for the last 15 years. Now the exasperated "living corpse" has submitted his case to a reichstag deputy, who, after convincing himself that Wothke is alive, took up the matter with the Hamburg authorities.

He submitted full details as to Wothke's whereabouts and doings for the last 16 years, urging that the authorities revise their opinion that Sailor Wothke is dead.

But the efforts of the reichstag deputy, too, were of no avail. The Hamburg department of justice, politely but firmly, refused to annul the erroneous entry in the city register and to "reincarnate" Wothke.

The authorities pointed out that, even with the best of intentions, they could not possibly do such a thing, as the existing law provides that "a protest for the annulment of an erroneous entry in the city register must be launched one month after the entry has been effected, no matter when the error came to the knowledge of those concerned!

Since Wothke failed to enter his protest within the stipulated 30 days, he has to remain dead for the rest of his life.

GRETNA GREEN RETAINS CHARM FOR RUNAWAYS

No More Quick Marriages for Elopers, but Averages Four Weddings a Week.

London.—Gretna Green, whither runaway couples used to fly from the wrath of parents or guardians, still has its attraction for romantic lovers. In fact, the smithy at Gretna Green has just completed a record year. During 1928 marriages were celebrated over the historic anvil at the rate of four a week, which is about the same average as in the days of yore. Five of the bridegrooms were Americans. The number of American brides is not on record.

But the days are gone since eloping swains and sweethearts fled northward, pursued on horseback, perhaps, by angry fathers and brothers armed with hunting whips, to get married quickly before vengeance could overtake them. Gretna Green no longer gives the protection to lovers that it did. No longer can a couple rush into the smithy or tollhouse, fling down a guinea and demand to be married there and then without any questions being asked. That was all altered over seventy years ago, when Lord Brougham's act put obstacles in the way of the matrimonial escapades of couples who sought sanctuary in this little town just inside the Scottish border.

That act provide among other things that a wedding there must be regarded as irregular and invalid unless one of the parties to it has been resident in Scotland for at least 21 days before the ceremony. The usual procedure nowadays is for the officiating blacksmith to ask the couple if one of them has complied with this stipulation and whether, if they are under age, they have the consent of their parents or guardians to get married. If everything is satisfactory, bride and bridegroom join hands over the anvil, on which a Bible is placed, and the blacksmith declares them to be lawfully married. It may be mentioned, however, that quite a number of romantic couples who go through this form of matrimonial contract prefer to confirm the legality of their marriage state by having another and more formal ceremony performed elsewhere.

Lincoln, Neb.—Railroads must be careful about snakes in their roundhouses. Allowing a verdict of $28,000 for a workman bitten in an engine pit, the state Supreme court overruled the railroad's contention that snake bite was a common risk of mankind

Appetite for Venison Lures Trout to Death

Edmonton, Alberta, Canada.—How a deer, although dead, lured a bull trout to its doom, was told recently by Kelly Sunderman, Grande Prairie guide. Sunderman took a party of American hunters into the wilds of the Western Peace country, on the headwaters of the Porcupine river.

Camped near a creek, Sunderman was preparing for the skillet a chunk of venison which had been bounding over the hills until a bullet from one of the hunters laid it low.

As he dipped the meat under the water, there was a swirl and a big bull trout nearly jerked the meat from the guide's hand.

Twice more did the fish attempt, feloniously, unlawfully and with malice prepense, to deprive the guide of his supper, before Sunderman, losing his temper at the near loss of his supper, picked up a rock of the tertiary period and tossed it at the bull trout as it made another attack.

Baked bull trout preceded the venison steaks on the camp bill of fare that evening.

Finger Lost Overnight Replaced by Surgeon

Glasgow.—A remarkable operation was performed successfully here on a young man who had lost his right forefinger while at work. An all-night search failed to recover the severed portion, but it was found in the sawdust in the morning. A surgeon treated it with saline preparation to keep it alive, and successfully replaced it on the hand.

Hard to Shake Belief in Prophetic Dreams

One of the most ancient and tenacious superstitions is that dreams are prophetic. In any large community there is at least one publication that devotes space to the interpretation of dreams and ever since the first printing press there have been dream books printed and widely sold. The prevalence of the word "Dreams," in popular songs, is another indication of its hold on the imagination. Yet dreams, as it has been pointed out a thousand times in recent years, positively are not prophetic and only come true by chance or when the person having the dream earnestly desires something he has never seen or experienced therein and will, in his waking moments, exert every effort to obtain it. Dreams are wishes of fulfillment in a childish state of mind, reflecting no intelligence. Even the psycho-analysts, who interpret dreams offhand, frequently err because they are not in possession of all the facts of the subject's life.

Denver Boy is a Winner

Every mother realizes how important it is to teach children good habits of conduct but many of them fail to realize the importance of teaching their children good bowel habits until the poisons from decaying waste held too long in the system have begun to affect the child's health.

Watch your child and at the first sign of constipation, give him a little California Fig Syrup. Children love its rich, fruity taste and it quickly drives away those distressing ailments, such as headaches, bad breath, coated tongue, biliousness, feverishness, fretfulness, etc. It gives them a hearty appetite, regulates their stomach and bowels and gives tone and strength to these organs so they continue to act normally, of their own accord. For over fifty years, leading physicians have prescribed it for half-sick, bilious, constipated children. More than 4 million bottles used a year shows how mothers depend on it.

Mrs. C. G. Wilcox, 3855½ Wolff St., Denver, Colorado, says: "My son, Jackie, is a prize winner for health, now, but we had a lot of trouble with him before we found his trouble was constipation and began giving him California Fig Syrup. It fixed him up quick, gave him a good appetite, made him sleep fine and he's been gaining in weight right along since the first few days, taking it."

Banana a Plant Oddity

The first paradox about the banana is that it is a tree, by virtue of its size and height, without a true trunk, says the Nature Magazine. The tallest banana plants measure 40 feet from the tips of the leaves to the ground. In Jamaica they attain about 25 feet, the first 15 feet of which is approximately the remarkable "pseudostem," or false trunk; the remainder the blades of the huges leaves which tower above it.

Stylish people certainly do brighten up the place, anywhere. Who doesn't like to see them?

HUNT FOR EARLY AMERICAN LIFE

Prehistoric Man May Have Lived in This Country.

Denver, Colo.—Scientists are digging into the earth in many sections of the western plains country, seeking more light on fairly well established contentions that prehistoric man existed in America millions of years ago.

The work being done contradicts to a great extent the common belief that the life of man in America did not approach the antiquity found in Europe.

Harold J. Cook, honorary curator of paleontology at the Colorado museum of natural history, gave a synopsis of recent scientific achievements in this region when he addressed the Colorado-Wyoming academy of sciences at Denver university.

"During the Pleistocene age we have ample evidence that various races of bison invaded America from Asia," he said. "In fact, Asia is now generally admitted to have been the center of development and dispersal of mammalian life throughout tertiary times.

"Now, with all these things in mind, is it not logical to believe that early man, developing under such conditions, could migrate into America quite as well as the game he hunted, at any time they could get there?"

Following out this line of thought, Doctor Cook told of recent discoveries tending to substantiate the theory. At the town of Colorado, in southwest Texas, were found skeletons of a new type of extinct, flat horned bison, and remains of two races of elephant, a large camel, various extinct horses and other typically Pleistocene mammals."

"In taking out an articulated skeleton of one of these flat horned bison," Cook said, "representatives of the Colorado museum found three arrow heads definitely associated in the matrix with it and under conditions that preclude the possibility of error. They were undoubtedly shot into that very buffalo."

At about the same time fossil remains of a large extinct bison were found near Folsom, N. M.

"The American museum, New York, was invited to participate in the work this last summer," said Cook, "and did so. Here, associated with the bison, sixteen flint points were found of an absolutely new type and of the finest grade of workmanship known in flaked stone.

"Fortunately, four of these were exposed undisturbed in position where found during the course of these excavations. There is no question of definite association here of these flint points with a race of extinct bison."

Island of Heligoland Slowly Crumbling Away

Heligoland.—This little German island, English North sea outpost until 1890, has lost 13,000 square meters swallowed up by mountainous waves when recent fierce gales caused havoc along the west European coast as far as Norway.

The damage done here and to the neighboring East Frisian island chain has led the Prussian survey department to appoint a commission to make a scientific study of the whole coastline to ascertain if there is any dangerous acceleration in the gradual subsidence of the German North sea shores.

It is known that the whole coast is sinking, but only at the rate of about ten inches in the last 100 years. Coming investigations are expected to show whether the sinking process calls for extra precautions.

Documents Prove Origin of Vatican Art Works

London.—A small but valuable collection of manuscripts relating to work done by eminent Italian artists for the Vatican is to be found in Soho, the foreign restaurant quarter of London. They are the property of Barberi, the padrone of the Taverna Medicea.

So precious are these manuscripts that Barberi exhibits them rarely. They bear the signatures of such illustrious artists as Bramente, Donatello, Mantegna, Raphael and Pietro della Francesca. All were acquired by their owner in London during the World war.

The most important was written by Michaelangelo in Italian. It is his agreement to erect the tomb of Pope Julius II. in St. Peter's, and is dated 1513.

Bandit Returns Funds

Acapulco, Mexico.—J. Calderon, a famous local rebel chief, has earned for himself a reputation for scrupulous honesty. He invariably returns money obtained from public offices in the towns he raids. He considers such money "borrowed" for the cause.

Old Trolley Cars as Resort Cottages

Benton Harbor, Mich.—J. J. Bachunas, proprietor of the Tabor resort, a romantic spot on the St. Joseph river six miles east of here, announces that he has purchased old interurban cars and expects to convert them into summer cottages.

At least six of the huge interurbans have been in service twenty years on the run from Benton Harbor to Eau Claire, Indian Lake and Dowagiac.

PAINTS WASHINGTON FIRST MILLIONAIRE

Lawyer Describes Business Genius of General.

New York.—The first American millionaire was George Washington, according to Eugene E. Prussing, Los Angeles lawyer, formerly of Chicago, who has just completed thirteen years of research into Washington's career as a business man. Summing up the results of his study in the American Magazine, Mr. Prussing says:

"It is customary to think of Washington as soldier and statesman. He was also a man of business, successful farmer, builder of transportation, engineer, pioneer and promoter. He was a man of broad commercial vision and rare business ability. He spent one-fourth of his life in public service and yet left behind him a record of business achievement and a fortune that entitles him to be called our first millionaire. He started life with but a few cents of his own. When he died the land and other investments that he directed to be sold were worth, by his own conservative estimate in his will, $530,000, and this did not include some of the most valuable portions of his estate.

"To many of us Washington is a mythical figure, hidden behind fables like that of the self-righteous little boy and the hypothetical cherry tree. As a matter of fact, he was a very different sort of person. He was a man who would have been perfectly at ease in a group of modern big business men around the directors' table. And he enjoyed fox hunting and dancing, as the modern man enjoys golf.

Was Good Business Man.

"In his ideals, his sense for giving value as well as getting it, his insistence on exact statistics, his zeal for big constructive undertakings, for striking into virgin fields, seizing opportunities, opening avenues to development, his instinctive sizing-up of the possibilities of profit in a deal—in all these matters and others like them, his attitude was strikingly similar to that of the best of modern business. He did not definitely formulate any rules for moneymaking, but he followed certain basic principles throughout his career."

Washington's apprenticeship in business started soon after his father's death, which occurred when the boy was twelve.

"From that time," Mr. Prussing says, "he was pretty much on his own, and was always faced with the problem of making a living.

Washington's first job was as an apprentice surveyor with G. W. Fairfax. At seventeen he became official surveyor of Culpepper county, and began his life work as an engineer. He had the thrifty idea of not taking all his pay in cash. He knew where the best acres were located, and, believing that land prices would rise, he began putting his extra pay into good land.

Made $15,000 a Year.

His returns on farming later averaged as high as $15,000 a year. He ran a gristmill at Mount Vernon. He conducted fisheries on ten miles of waterfront, shipping his product to England and the West Indies. He maintained a ferry across the Potomac, which paid a handsome profit. He devoted six years as managing director of a company which was engaged in drainage and lumbering operations in Virginia, and he was president of the Potomac River company, a navigation and development enterprise which eventually evolved into the Chesapeake & Ohio and the Baltimore & Ohio railroad systems. He purchased 53,000 acres of land in Pennsylvania, Ohio and West Virginia.

"In business he was careful about exacting value and giving it. He performed his contracts and promises according to the spirit as well as the letter, even when doing so involved heavy losses.

"Washington ran his business affairs by exact knowledge. He always knew where he stood. He kept complete records of receipts and expenditures and of all business transactions.

Mississippi Boy of 10 Wears Size 25 Shoes

Racine, Wis.—A pair of size 25 shoes has just been made for a ten-year-old schoolboy by a Racine shoe manufacturing company. The purchaser is Robert Wadlow, an elementary school student of Alton, Miss. The boy is 6 feet 10 inches tall and weighs 250 pounds.

Five square feet of leather were used to manufacture the shoes.

Physicians say that if the boy continues to grow he will be nine feet tall when he reaches maturity.

World's Biggest Tooth Is 50,000 Years Old

Boston, Mass.—The largest tooth in the world, measuring 11 feet 2 inches in length and weighing more than 300 pounds, has just arrived at the Harvard Dental school museum. It came from the jaw of a mastadon, and scientists estimate that is more than 50,000 years old. The tusk was found embedded in the bank of the Porcupine river, a tributary of the Yukon, in Alaska.

Subs for Dad

New York.—Seymour Agald, ten years old, appeared in Traffic court for his sick father. So good was his plea that sentence was suspended.

URGE REFORM IN HOUSE OF LORDS

Would Limit Membership of British Body.

London.—The house of lords is demanding a reform which would limit its membership and provide for certain peers to be elected.

It seems likely that the country will eventually adopt some sort of plan like this, since it is widely asserted that the present constitution of the British upper house renders it not only impotent but inefficient. There are many who would like to see it on a par with the United States senate. Others would like to see it abolished altogether.

Would Limit Members.

This situation is recognized by the house of lords itself. The latest move was to vote by 52 to 8 that "it is desirable that early steps should be taken to limit the number of members of the house of lords and to make provision for an elective representative or nomination as would insure to each political party a fair position in the house of lords."

Three Parts to Parliament.

Theoretically, parliament is divided in three parts, the king, the house of commons and the house of lords and the assent of each component is required before an act of parliament can become a law, with certain exceptions. Actually, the house of commons makes the laws, because the king supports its decisions and the commons control the lords with the threat of creating any number of peers needed to pass a bill through the house of lords should the upper house prove recalcitrant.

Signal Hill, Calif., Claims Title as Richest City

Long Beach, Calif.—The richest city in the world is Signal Hill. That is, for its size it is the richest.

The title was claimed in a report filed by the captain of its fire department. According to his statement, each of the 1,373 acres of producing oil land included within the city's boundaries bears an average assessed valuation of $19,500, or a total of $29,707,000 for the entire city.

The same report placed the per capita wealth at $6,820.

Signal Hill has existed as a corporate city for a little more than five years. It withdrew from the jurisdiction of Long Beach as a result of the enormous oil activities then going on. It is this wealth of petroleum products that is held responsible for its financial position.

Knitting Craze Sweeps Through Smith College

The more severe manifestations are as yet confined to dormitories, but it is feared that campus and classrooms may yet feel the effects of the sweep. In its wake are found such utilitarian articles as sweater suits, rather than the more strictly domestic comforter.

The most desolate locality in the stricken houses is the dining room. Students, according to a newly passed regulation, are not allowed to bring their knitting to meals, lest, perchance, the yarn become confused with the food, it said, including that food with the Italian name.

The Victorian pastime is explained by the victims, not as a return to naive artlessness, but as a triumph of sophistication.

Proof of Scotch Thrift Found in Bankbooks

Glasgow, Scotland.—Scottish thrift is not fiction.

One of every three of the population has a bankbook, and savings for 1928 constitute a record, says the annual report of the Glasgow Savings bank.

The amount due depositors is $120,000,000, an increase of $4,000,000 over last year, while 40,000 "homesafes"—small cash boxes—are in use.

The number of depositors, the volume of business transacted, the balance at depositors' credit and the banks' reserve each constitute a record.

Coincidence

Hempstead, N. Y.—"It's the first time I ever talked to a princess," remarked a policeman on examining the license of a young woman who had parked overtime. "And it's the first time I ever talked to a policeman," replied Mrs. W. B. Leeds (Princess Xenia of Russia). A $10 fine is in the offing apparently.

Wife Loses Her Ring, Hubby Finds It in Pie

Mill City, Ore.—L. G. Foster claims the distinction of having had one of the most valuable pieces of lemon pie in history.

When he attacked a generous piece of the pie, Foster discovered an expensive diamond ring. He was jubilant until his wife exclaimed, "That's mine!"

Mrs. Foster had removed the ring and placed it on a window ledge just above the table where she made the pie. When she finished her work, she searched for the ring, without success.

Foster found it—with his teeth.

PROOF OF DYES is in the dyeing!

Words won't dye a dress, or coat, or sweater. It takes real anilines to do that. That's why Diamond Dyes contain from three to five times more anilines than any other dye—by actual test.

It's the anilines in Diamond Dyes that do the work; that give the colors such brilliance; such depth and permanence. It's real aniline that keeps them from giving things that re-dyed look; from spotting or streaking.

Next time you have dyeing to do—try Diamond Dyes. Then compare results. See how soft, bright, new-looking the colors are. Observe how they keep their brilliance through wear and washing. Your dealer will refund your money if you don't agree Diamond Dyes are better dyes.

Lampblack Melts Ice

Remembering that black absorbs the sun's rays and holds the heat, the captain of a ship in Alaska ordered a long strip of refuse oil and lampblack, 40 feet wide, to be swabbed across a frozen lake where his boat was held. In a short time, the strip had melted or softened so that the steamer could break through the channel.

Cause for Worry

Mrs. Grant had given her ten-year old neighbor, Joe, some fresh-baked home-made cookies, deliciously dusted with granulated sugar. Joe evidently had experienced some difficulties in the past with the efficient eating of every crumb of such dainties, for he turned to his mother with an anxious air and queried: "Mamma, is this sugar stationary?"

An Interesting Letter

The following letter was sent to us by Francis Faimen and tell an interesting story about what the club members did at the Winter Shows at Crookston. We thank Miss Faiman for sending in the letter and also for many other items concerning club work, which she has sent in from time to time.

She is a live-wire club member of the Holt club and what we call the champion winner of this community.

The 4-H club members were very well taken care of at the Winter Shows at Crookston. The largest number of club members to exhibit at the shows, were there on Monday the first day, and were given rooms which Mr. Pflughoeft had reserved for them.

Monday morning the poultry was judged. In the afternoon the livestock was judged. In the evening the annual banquet was held, and all the club members were admitted free.

Tuesday the poultry judging was continued, and in the afternoon the dairy calves and baby beeves were judged. In the evening the boys and girls were entertained by 4-H club members who had won scholarships to the Northwest School and who are there now attending the second semester. These members won their scholarships on 4-H club leadership in their communities.

There are four boys and four girls that won scholarships. Songs were sung by all the members. One boy sang a song he had made up himself, and everybody liked his singing so well that he was called on for another song and then he sang an old Swedish song.

Wednesday morning a meeting was held in the Armory. H. Pflughoeft announced the events of the day and T. Erickson gave an interesting talk on "Some objects of 4-H Club Work."

In the evening the club members were entertained at the Armory.

Thursday O. M. Kiser talked on "Feeds and Feeding" for the farm animals, to the club memmbers.

T. A. Erickson talked on community leadership among the 4-H club members. The more leaderi in the clubs the better they are.

A. M. Pilkey talked on "Poultry Culling" stating the chief points in a good producing hen.

All the members who so wished were taken out to the Northwest School of Agriculture and shown thru the different buildings.

In the evening the members went to the Theatre in a body and were admitted at half price.

Friday the members were judging livestock and poultry, and some very good judging was done. In the afternoon they were given free tickets to go and hear the Northwestern Minnesota Singers Association at the Armory.

The club members enjoyed a very good time at the Winter Shows.

Francis Faiman.

Starved Rock

ON THE south bank of the Illinois river near the busy little city of Utica a tremendous rock lifts its head some 125 feet above the water in the river. Its water side is so sheer that it is unclimbable, but its crest, which is perhaps half an acre in extent, is reachable from its land side.

Set down in the midst of a flat countryside of great extent this vast rock pile at once catches the eye of the approaching traveler. It is the outstanding feature of a state park which embraces some 900 acres of scenic beauty—canyons, hills, rocks, forests, mounds and streams—a natural beauty spot, known as Starved Rock.

Here Indian legend and romance meet. In 1683 French explorers built a fort in honor of their king. This was abandoned some 80 years later and a band of Illini Indians, pursued by the savage Pottawatomies with whom they were at war, driven to their last resort, took refuge on the top of this rock. As the story goes, the Pottawatomies made no atempt to capture the rock, but they did so guard its base as to prevent the Illinis from procuring food or water or to escape and they were slowly starved to death or leaped into the placid waters of the river below and perished.

The state of Illinois, desiring to preserve the historic landmark, purchased it in 1911.

To Our Egg Producers

During the month of February the egg market took an unexpected advance and the advance price of 20c per dozen with an additional guaranteed premium of 4c on Land O' Lakes Standards and 8 cents on the Land O' Lakes Extras is out of line with what the producers could receive locally for their eggs, but with the very favorable market condition, the Land O' Lakes Creameries, Incorparated, was able to sell the eggs at a very satisfactory price and because of this situation the final settlemens on all eggs delivered during the month of February thru the local creamery will be as follows:

Land O' Lakes Extras	34c
Land O' Lakes Standards	30c
No. 2	34c

That is a premium of 14 cents on Land O' Lakes Extras, 10 cents on Land O' Lakes Standards, and 4c on No. 2. These are net prices to the farmer and we doubt very much if they could have received any more money for like grades thru any other chanel even though there was an extremely fine local demand for eggs sold through the country stores.

Many producers have not taken into consideration that the advance price on day of delivery is merely an advance and if the market conditions warrant we will pay an additional price over and above the quotation which is issued from time to time.

Just what the egg market will do in March is a question and we cannot make any definite statements at this time, but we will assure you that the interest of the producer will be taken care of.

Deliver your eggs at the creamery when you deliver your cream to insure the best quality and highest price. Adv.

Varieties of Canaries

Canaries were known in a domesticated state at the close of the Fourteenth century, though they may not have been common, as Gesner, who wrote in 1555, said that he had never seen one. Variation among them began early, as partly yellow birds were known as Nuremberg in 1614 and in 1677 wholly yellow canaries (also a white variety) were recorded from Augsburg, in Germany, an early center for the fancy. The various forms have had their origin in distinct geographical areas, and though some are almost extinct at present, all at one time or another have had a devoted following of fanciers. At present at least 14 distinct strains, with a large number of varieties, are known.

ATLANTA BOY, 13, IS A SKYSCRAPER

Youth Is Growing Toward New Altitude Mark.

Atlanta, Ga.—How would you like to be thirteen again—but seven feet two inches tall?

That is the age and height of Henry Mullins of Atlanta. He hopes to be a football star at Georgia Tech some day.

Doctors say the trouble—if it can be called that—is caused by overactivity of the youth's pituitary gland, a ductless organ below the brain. Such overactivity causes the rise of most giants.

Henry Mullins is in the seventh grade in school. His report card is usually worth showing to his father and mother—A's and B's. On top of that he is a good golf player. He goes around in the 80s and some of his drives are 250 yards.

Henry doesn't look toward golf for success, however. "All the club handles are too short, anyway. I want to be a boxer and a football player, but I can't find anybody to box with me," he said.

Henry's shoes are size 14. The rest of his attire is in proportion.

He plays end on the high school football team, center on the basket ball team. He drops some baskets in without poking his hand over his head. He played first base in baseball and was utility man on the mound. Henry is a wow in sports!

C. E. Mullins, a six footer, brother of the young giant, claims his big brother eats only about as much as the average thirteen-year-old boy eats, "only it goes farther."

If Henry keeps on growing—and he doesn't want to—he will, by averages with normally sized humans—leap into something like ten feet of humanity—a world's record. However, doctors are going to give some treatments to that little pituitary gland.

Sails Over Earthquake; Feels Ship "Hit Bottom"

Washington, D. C.—Sailing over an earthquake that was sufficiently severe to be felt by seismographs throughout the world was the experience of a British ship, the Magalda, that has just been reported to the hydrographic office here.

The report incidentally confirms the location of the quake made on December 2, the day after it happened, by the United States coast and geodetic survey, with the aid of telegraphic data gathered from a number of observatories by Science Service.

Capt. W. S. Smales, the steamer's commander, reported that on December 1, while en route from Talcahuano to Tocopilla, Chile, they felt three heavy bumps as if the vessel had struck bottom. Their position was latitude 35 degrees 33.5 minutes south and longitude 72 degrees 54 minutes west, where the charts show a depth from 400 to 600 feet. Careful examination showed that no damage was done.

According to Commander N. H. Heck, in charge of the coast and geodetic survey's earthquake investigations, the ship must have been very close to the center, or it would not have been felt as it was. The three bumps, he thinks, were due to three separate shocks, of which probably only one was severe enough to set up the earthquake waves which traveled around the earth and permitted the seismologists to locate it when they were received on the seismographs.

Frogs Learn Geometry, Experimenter Declares

Berlin, Germany.—Frogs are not so dumb as they look. They can learn a simple proposition in geometry, as that a square is not a triangle. And they will remember their lesson for a little while at least if they are paid for it.

A European experimenter, S. Biedermann, has reported the results of tests on the learning capacity of frogs. He set square and triangular blocks in pairs before his squat pupils. One block would have a delectable insect attached to it, the other would have nothing. After a sufficient number of repetitions the frog would learn that one shape was associated with the idea of food, the other with the idea of remaining empty; and when both blocks were presented without the accustomed bait the frog would hop expectantly to the one that had hitherto served as his dinner table.

A number of different species of frogs and toads were thus "educated." Tree frogs proved to be the most apt pupils.

Baby of No Cash Value Ontario Court Decides

Hamilton, Ont.—Judge Elliot of Halton county has ruled that a nine-months-old child is of no cash value to its parents.

This ruling was made known recently in the suit of John Ashwood of Toronto against Ross McPhail of this city, for damages for the death of their son, William, in August, 1927. The men were involved in an auto crash near Oakville, the baby dying of a fractured skull.

The judge said a child was only a remote source of remuneration; that he was a liability, and that no allowance, but only sympathy, could go to the grief-stricken parents.

PASTOR TAKES POST ON "LONELIEST ISLE"

Dauntless Padre Sees Rats as Worst Problem.

The dauntless padre—a bachelor—already has suffered the perils and hardships of frontier posts in distant South African and South American fields.

With his Bible and "vest pocket" organ, as inspiration and aids to his labors, Mr. Partridge is taking with him to Tristan a huge supply of rat poison. For rats are the fiercest creatures in this lonely ocean oasis.

The traveling preacher—still on the sunny side of middle age—has a vigorous frame and trim figure. It was just recently that he returned home to London from his ministry in Brazil. But when he heard that the chaplain at Tristan da Cunha was sick and must be relieved he volunteered at once for the uninviting task.

Serves in Africa.

After serving during the war in the British Red Cross, Mr. Partridge entered the Anglican ministry and soon responded to the call for foreign service in the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. He went out to South Africa and in the Johannesburg mining districts—rough and unruly as mining countries are—he took charge of three churches, one of these for natives.

"I had to rush about from one church to another on my motor bike," he said, in relating his adventures, "and they called me 'the Flying Parson.'

"One day a native woman came running to me, her face streaming with blood. She had been attacked by some superstitious persons, both Christian and non-Christian, who charged that she had buried a charm in front of the church and caused the death of a native deacon.

"I put on all my canonical vestments to overawe the crowd. Then I went out and dug up the ground myself to show them there was no charm there. I had to excommunicate the church members who had attacked the poor woman."

Santos a Hard Field.

After other like trials, Mr. Partridge was transferred across the Atlantic to Santos, the great Brazilian coffee port. The young clergyman found this city a strenuous field. Carousing sailors, reckless beachcombers, and down-and-outers of many nationalities destroyed the peace of the place and made his life one fight after another.

But in this new island station the preacher no longer will have to struggle with violent men and worse women. Tristan's population is not much more than 100. Its farmers and fishermen are described as moral and religious, industrious and hospitable; they have no alcoholic liquors, and they have no crime among them.

The new chaplain will have charge of the education of the children of the island, who are contented prisoners on the little area of 16 square miles

Manila.—The Philippine government will henceforth tell students who are sent to the United States what courses to study. An oversupply of physicians and lawyers in the islands has led to a shortage of technically trained college graduates.

In view of the big demand for technologists and experts in the industrial arts they will be permitted to study only fish, meat and vegetable canning and other such industries.

Heretofore government students, or pensionades, as they are known locally, were free to choose their careers. In most instances they took up law, medicine, education and similar academic courses. Upon returning to the Philippines they found difficulty in obtaining work, since those professions were crowded. Many of them returned to the United States, thus yielding the Philippine government no return for the money spent for their education.

South America Buys German Made Planes

Berlin.—Germany's aircraft industry will bid high and vigorously for a lion's share of the South American demand. The move will be aimed at powerful French competitors.

Germans have done much pioneer work in the development of aerial transportation in various South American republics. In the first ten months of 1928, ten German machines were shipped to Brazil, where the Condor syndicate maintains a regular service from Rio Janeiro to Rio Grande do Sul, with planned extension to Montevideo and Buenos Aires, while a German group in Peru has secured a concession for establishing air services with neighboring countries.

COSMIC RAY FINDS RADIUM IN ASHES

Millikan Machine Picks It Out of Last Barrel.

Pasadena, Calif.—When one of Dr. Robert A. Millikan's electroscopes, developed in connection with his cosmic ray experiments, was enlisted as a detective, a problem as difficult as "looking for a needle in a haystack" was solved within two hours.

Through the use of the delicate instrument $4,000 worth of radium which was accidentally thrown out with some ashes at the Pasadena hospital was recovered.

John Ransom, California Institute of Technology technician, was sent to the hospital with one of the cosmic ray machines and, after barrel after barrel of ashes had been brought in front of the electroscope the instrument indicated that radium was present in the last barrel.

While hospital officials anxiously watched the proceedings in the basement of the institution the barrel containing the capsule filled with fifty milligrams of the most precious substance in the world was emptied into small boxes. It was only when the observers were about to give up hope that the brass tube, about the size of a match-end, was discovered in the last box.

The electroscope, it was stated, picks up the radium emanations, being so sensitive that it can record them from a radiolite watch. Two quartz fibers that are suspended almost together are charged with electricity, which repels them. When the fibers are exposed to radium, which absorbs electricity from the air, they are brought together, the speed with which they approach each other indicating the amount of radium in the vicinity. No matter how minute the radium particles, the instrument is said to be capable of detecting them at a distance of 100 feet.

The radium which was recovered is the property of Dr. Paul Ferrier, and is one of the two largest supplies of the precious substance in this city.

Dragons May Be Dead, but Their Blood Stays

Medan, Sumatra.—Fairy tales of knights and dragons may pass with more credulous generations, but trade in dragon blood goes on.

Only the modern dragon blood is a red gum obtained from the ripe fruit of palm trees growing in Siam and the Dutch East Indies, which finds prosaic uses in pharmacy and for coloring varnish.

Production is purely a native industry, the American consul reports. Although some natives have lands planted to palms, most of them use the wild trees as a source of supply and sell the blood, obtained by steaming, crushing or both, to Chinese trades in the villages.

When traders have acquired considerable quantities they ship to Chinese dealers in Penang and Singapore, Straits Settlements, whence the material is exported to Europe and America.

New Forests Will Cost More Than $6,000,000

Washington. — Embracing Minnesota, Wisconsin and Michigan, the new Great Lakes district, to be known as national forest district No. 9, already contains ten national forest units with a total of nearly 1,200,000 acres of government land.

W. M. Jardine, secretary of agriculture, has appointed Earl S. Tinker district forester, with temporary headquarters at Madison, Wis.

In recognition of the acute need which exists in this region for reclamation of large areas of land adapted to timber production but at present denuded and unproductive, the national forest reservation commission has approved a program contemplating eventual acquisition of an additional 2,500,000 acres of land in the three states. The purchase program will involve the expenditure of more than $6,000,000 of federal funds.

Runaway Building Nearly Wrecks Railroad Train

Red Wing, Minn.—A railway wreck was narrowly averted here when an engineer brought his train to a stop just a few feet short of a "runaway building" which blocked the tracks. The building, it may be explained, got away from workmen who were moving it from one location to another. The Chicago Great Western railway engineer saw the obstruction in time to halt his train. Workmen hacked away one corner of the building and the train continued its journey.

Bees Buzz Busily for 800,000 in U. S.

Madison, Wis.—More than 800,000 people in the United States are keeping bees and the value of the honey crop runs from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 annually, figures compiled by H. F. Wilson of the agricultural staff of the University of Wisconsin reveal.

Wilson says beekeeping has splendid prospects for the future and great possibilities in almost every state. However, he insists, the industry lacks leadership and finance.

The Test of Peter Keer

By AD SCHUSTER

(Copyright.)

THE little room on the fourth floor of the ramshackle building in which lived the family of Peter Keer shook whenever an elevated train passed below.

"We'll get out of here," Peter promised again. "I'll get a job of some kind, see if I don't. And then, we can go to the country where I can always work, and the kids will get fat."

Then it was Peter wrote his advertisement and spent most of the money he had left for its publication.

"For a term of years," it said, "I will bind myself to work as a servant. Will be at your beck and call, do anything that is honest. My family must live and I am for sale. Who will bid?"

Gilson Blagg, the remains of a once active man anchored to a chair by rheumatism, read the advertisement and marked it.

"I was just wondering," he said, "if there was any adventure left in the world, and how far a man would go for it. This appeal may be bunk calculated for sympathy, or it may be real. I'm going to find out."

So Peter Keer was sent the money to travel to the country estate of Gilson Blagg, a servant bound to his master, and the family was assured enough money to keep from want

"You're mine, you understand that?" Gilson glared at the younger man. "You are to take your orders, forget your family, and work for me. I'll ask you to do strange things and expect you to do them. Are you ready?"

Peter nodded. There was nothing else he could do.

Then Gilson drew forth a map, a chart, and a bundle of paper.

"You will see," he explained, "they are directions for finding something, a treasure perhaps. I got them long ago and was going to do the hunting myself but," he motioned to his legs, "my rheumatism won't let me off. See what you can make of them."

Peter studied over the papers all one night and a part of the next day. When he reported, Gilson smiled

"Yes, I could have told you that. You go along the ridge to the stunted oak. Somewhere under the oak, you'll find something. It may be the treasure or it may be more directions. That is all I could make of it, too."

So Peter went to digging and it took him more than a week before he found the box. Inside was a small bag of gold coins, no great treasure but the promise of more, for a faded paper with them carried instructions for still another search. The servant brought bag and paper back to Gilson and was ordered to continue.

It was a fantastic job; at any rate it was paying wages. Three more boxes were uncovered, and with them old Gilson told a story of the eccentric man who used to live in the hills and of this way he had taken to hide his fortune from all but the determined and energetic. In all Peter had dug up several thousand dollars to see Gilson Blagg toss them into a safe. The master shared nothing with the servant. It did not occur to Peter how easy it would have been to run away with one of these bags.

In the last box were directions which seemed ridiculously easy. It meant a journey through a thicket, over a hill, and then: "This is the last stop, the big reward." Peter thought of going on but remembered his instructions. He was to bring each box in as found, to report each discovery to his master.

"H'm, this is different," Gilson agreed. "It says open the door and the treasure is there. Must be a cave or another box. Wish I could go and see. Take your directions carefully and when you reach the spot, look for a door. Look in the tree trunks, anywhere, open the first door you see."

So Peter, expecting to find a mysterious hiding place for gold, followed instructions and stumbled out of the thicket into a grove in which nestled a bungalow. He looked at the house in amazement and remembering his instructions, opened the door.

They were waiting for him, the wife and children, and they set up a great cry when he entered!

"We have been here for several weeks," the wife said. "He told us not to tell a soul or leave the place and that when you came, if you came, we would know you passed the test and were foreman of the ranch."

Blessed Twin Senses

We mortals are asked to walk a pretty straight line. There are pitfalls on both sides of that line and the ones we are apt to overlook are pointed out by Sir C. C. Wakefield in the following passage:

"Of every good quality there is an excess which is undesirable. Excess of self-reliance leads to secretiveness and mulish obstinacy; of curiosity to impertinence; of imagination to hesitation and inaction; of foresight to indecision; of patience to weak submission, and so on. To give due weight, and no more than its due weight to each ingredient in the composition of our character, we are fortunate if we are blessed with those twin senses, a sense of proportion and a sense of humor. As a sweetener of life, preserving the rich from odious self-satisfaction and helping all to banish the demons of discontent and ill-will, there is nothing to compare with a sense of humor."—Boston Transcript.

When your Children Cry for It

Baby has little upsets at times. All your care cannot prevent them. But you can be prepared. Then you can do what any experienced nurse would do—what most physicians would tell you to do—give a few drops of plain Castoria. No sooner done than Baby is soothed; relief is just a matter of moments. Yet you have eased your child without use of a single doubtful drug; Castoria is vegetable. So it's safe to use as often as an infant has any little pain you cannot pat away. And it's always ready for the crueler pangs of colic, or constipation or diarrhea; effective, too, for older children. Twenty-five million bottles were bought last year.

Odd Bird Sought Refuge

Resembling a wild duck, but much larger, a bird flew onto the deck of a liner when the steamer was about 300 miles from the Scilly islands recently. It was very vicious and could be captured only with the aid of a blanket.

It was webfooted, white with black-tipped wings, and had a long beak. After a rest it refused to stay on the liner and was released the day following its capture.

Girl at the Top in Health Test

Millions of boys and girls all over the world, thousands of them right here in the West are being restored to health and strength by the purely vegetable tonic and laxative known as California Fig Syrup and endorsed by physicians for over 50 years.

Children need no urging to take it. They love its rich, fruity flavor. Nothing can compete with it as a gentle, but certain laxative, and it goes further than this. It gives tone and strength to the stomach and bowels so these organs continue to act normally, of their own accord. It stimulates the appetite, helps digestion.

A Kansas mother, Mrs. Dana Allgire, 610 Monroe St., Topeka, says: "Bonnie B. is absolutely the picture of health, now, with her ruddy cheeks, bright eyes and plump but graceful little body and she stands at the top in every health test.

Much of the credit for her perfect condition is due to California Fig Syrup. We have used it since babyhood to keep her bowels active during colds or any children's ailments and she has always had an easy time with them. She always responds to its gentle urging and is quickly back to normal."

Ask your druggist for California Fig Syrup and look for the word "California" on the carton so you'll always get the genuine.

The Girl Who Came Back

BY JACK WOODFORD

"Ten bucks," replied the lady carelessly. Lolita thought this exorbitant, but nevertheless she took out a ten-dollar bill and handed it to her. She had the taxi driver bring up her things, paid him off and set to unpacking, thankful that the lady had not recognized her. Nobody seemed ever to connect her with the Lolita Forbes of the newspaper article some months ago. She marveled a little that people should so quickly forget such things; and yet reflected that it was not unusual, so many things happened all the time in Chicago. She had given her correct name with some satisfaction; sailing under a specious flag was unpleasant, it always made her feel dishonest. She decided, however, still to write under the name of Margaret Farrar, since the commercial work she was doing might some day give way to really worth while work to which it would be a pleasure to sign her own name without having people connect it with the "confessions" and other superficial stories done merely for the money by "Margaret Farrar."

When she had her belongings straightened around to some extent she sat down to read the remainder of her morning paper. Turning a page she was made almost breathless by two pictures in the society column.

"Author Will Wed Heiress," the pictures were captioned. One picture was an extremely good likeness of Don Warrill, and the other was a photograph, which had evidently been greatly retouched, of Miss Pringle. The story below the pictures told of a wedding scheduled for June, with a prospective honeymoon in Europe to follow. There was also the usual sentimental blurb about its being a "love match—student falling in love with instructor," etc. It also described Miss Pringle as a young lady of undisputed talents since though she was wealthy she had made a journalist of herself by her own diligent efforts. Lolita wondered if Mr. Warrill could read that part of the article without laughing. She bit her lips to keep back the tears and got up and went to the window and stared off into the park. It was March. In three months Mr. Warrill would be married, would go away to Europe with Miss Pringle. Perhaps they'd talk of her . . laugh over the little idiot who got herself into such an awful mess. She could almost hear Warrill's rich voice say:

"And there was a time when I thought I was in love with her—can you imagine that, dear?"

Probably Miss Pringle would be unable to imagine it, and would have no backwardness about saying so—with embellishments. The hot tears rolled down her face as she stood by the window, and she realized that she loved Mr. Warrill just as much as ever—would always love him. Life was indeed cruel.

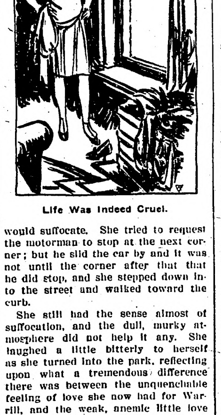
Determinedly she forced herself to stop thinking in that strain, put on her hat and coat and walked out to get some breakfast somewhere. After breakfast she boarded a car and went downtown, to the main library. An attendant pointed out the file card room and finding the right drawer she came to not less than a hundred and fifty or two hundred books bearing upon the subject of writing in its every possible phase. She selected three that she thought the most interesting and waited while an attendant got the volumes. She remembered the night that she had stayed after class to get Mr. Warrill to sign a library card guarantee for her, recalled how he had remarked that she looked more like a butterfly than a bookworm—would it ever be possible to forget his husky laugh, especially when one knew that some one else was hearing it? Presently the books came and she went out to take a car home.

As the car crawled along, stopping almost at every corner, she forced her mind to busy itself with something more substantial than husky laughs floating through her mind. She decided that she would have to work harder than she had ever worked before, since ninety dollars was now about all she had, and she wanted not only to make a living, but to save up enough to pay back Gray Eyes, and feel under no obligations to him.

To get her mind completely off of Mr. Warrill, she began to mentally plot out a serial. It would be a story about a girl who had actually taken a misstep and who had come back. So many stories of the sort were about pale, cringing little girls who skated along on the edge of wrongdoing, and finally were saved from it; it would be wonderful to get a serial printed that would encourage the many who had actually taken wrong steps and needed help and encouragement and the idea that it was not necessary to keep on going down afterward. Their problem was more acute, and more in need of solution than that of girls who merely "contemplated" wrongdoing. She remembered Harvey Torrence, and what he had represented to her. There had been a time when she honestly believed she loved him with all her heart and soul—and yet his passing had meant little to her. She saw now very clearly what really happened. She had been lonesome, terribly lonesome, alone in a big city. It had been easy then for Harvey to make love to her.

How much better one felt to see and understand the thing in that light, instead of thinking that a deliberate tendency toward badness had caused her false step. How much more people needed education than condemnation. If only more time could be spent in acquiring learning, instead of acquiring a specious knowledge of what persons should be condemned for, what their chances were for going to "hell" if they did this, that, and the other thing. . . . Lolita fairly glowed as she laid out scenes and continuity for a serial that should express this thought to girls who were condemning themselves as bad because of some misstep, set them to fighting back instead of slipping down just because they had done something wrong for which they were honestly sorry.

Suddenly some impulse caused her to look out of the car window, and there before her eyes stood the "bachelor's hotel," where Warrill lived. A terrific wave of depression took her. It seemed as though if she were to stay in the car another moment she would suffocate. She tried to request the motorman to stop at the next corner; but he slid the car by and it was not until the corner after that that he did stop, and she stepped down into the street and walked toward the curb.



Life Was Indeed Cruel.

She still had the sense almost of suffocation, and the dull, murky atmosphere did not help it any. She laughed a little bitterly to herself as she turned into the park, reflecting upon what a tremendous difference there was between the unquenchable feeling of love she now had for Warrill, and the weak, anemic little love feeling that she had had for Harvey Torrence, and which she had for a time mistaken for the real thing.

She had walked several blocks along the park paths when suddenly, with her head down, she almost ran into a man who blocked her way. She stopped and looked up, into the face of young Watterson. Completely at a loss she stammered:

"Why! I thought your father had sent you to Europe."

"He did," returned Watterson in a peculiarly dry tone, "but things have blown over and I came back. I'm awfully glad I met you. I've wanted to tell you how deeply I regret the terrible trouble I got you into." Somehow she sensed a change in him so profound that it was almost shocking. She gave voice to the thought.

"You've changed."

"Yes. I've changed. It was about time, wasn't it? Killing a man gives a fellow quite a turn. I can't get him out of my mind—and I couldn't get you out of my mind. I'm through with the sort of life that I used to live, on too much money. May I walk a little way with you?"

"Why, yes," said Lolita, a little uncertainly. He fell into step beside her. For about half a block they walked in silence and then he turned to her, and said:

"There is a whole lot that I want to say to you." His tone was so unmistakably earnest, and so different from his usual manner of speech that Lolita was profoundly moved.

CHAPTER IX

The change in Fred Watterson had been not only subjective but also objective. Apparently he had done less drinking. His face no longer had the puffed "massaged" look, and his eyes were steady, even solemn.

Lolita acknowledged that he was very handsome and very appealing in an impersonal sort of way, with his almost little boyish air of honest contrition and subdued sorrow for what he had done. When he suggested that they drop into the refectory in the park for a bite to eat she readily consented. The big refectory was almost empty and they chose seats by a window where they could look out over the North pond toward a little bridge that spanned it at a narrow point. With the leaden skies above, the glass-like water reflecting the leaning trees at the edge of the pond, the vista was one of distinct, if somewhat sad, beauty. When they had ordered sandwiches and coffee Fred leaned toward her across the table and spoke with a constrained air as though, somehow, he were almost afraid to have her answer his questions:

"What have you been doing since I last saw you?"

"Writing."

"Writing?"

"Yes, short stories; in fact, I'm going to start a serial which I hope to sell."

"Do you mean that you actually are supporting yourself from the proceeds of your writing—you're very young."

"Yes, I am young (she reflected that he was hardly much over twenty-five himself) but apparently very lucky; still, that's unfair—you see, I took part of a short story course under a very excellent instructor at Southwestern university, who helped me wonderfully. I suppose that I just have had some latent knack for it all of the time—or, perhaps, it's just that the unusual experiences I went through helped in some way."

His eyes searched her face anxiously; somehow, Lolita felt, he was not satisfied with this answer to his question.

"But how did you get out of jail, how did you live immediately after you got out of jail. How did you get the money to register at Southwestern; how did you support yourself until you sold your first story, and where did you go to lay low while the newspapers were broadcasting about you?"

His deep sincerity and entire lack of the former flippancy that had marked him prompted her to tell him the whole story, from beginning to end, omitting only the part about Mr. Warrill; somehow she could not bring herself to speak of him, she felt as though if she did a lump would come into her throat and choke her. She even told him enough about Harvey Torrence to enable him to guess the rest, which he did promptly, but without so much as a raised eyebrow of condemnation. "And," she ended, "I've never blamed you for what happened—something was almost inevitably bound to happen to me in order to wake me up. Had it not been for poor Harvey's death, I believe that I should be almost glad for what happened."

"You sincerely loved Harvey, then?" he quickly put in

"No, I'm ashamed to say that I didn't. I sincerely thought that I did, however, but I didn't; I'm quite sure of that now."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Need of Nourishment of Trees Overlooked

More than half of the trees in the world are sick. Many of them are afflicted with incurable diseases. Like human beings, trees are the victims of numerous ills, declares a writer in Thrift Magazine. They are constantly the prey of deadly parasites which attack every part from roots to topmost branches and work into the very heart of the wood.

Millions upon millions of fine trees every year die needlessly because their owners fail to appreciate their mute appeals for help.

Seventy-five per cent of all shade and fruit trees are afflicted with V-shaped crotches, which are sure to spread and kill the trees unless taken care of in time.

Many trees die of hunger or thirst, or both. Trees are living things and they must have water and nourishment. The top of a tree is a perfect index of the general health and vitality of the trunk and branches although the health of the top has no direct connection with internal decay. Good rich green foliage indicates, as a rule, excellent vitality and an active condition of the roots

Snake Belief a Myth

There is a small, harmless reptile of the more southerly United States which is called a hoop snake. And it takes its name from the notion that it curves itself in a hoop and thus travels along at a great rate of speed. The MAYTAG Cast Aluminum TUB

THE MAYTAG tub was originated and designed by the Maytag Company and a $900,000 aluminum foundry, the finest in America, was built to produce it economically.

It keeps the water hot for an entire washing and is shaped to guide the gyrafoamed water into many cross currents. The sediment trap collects the loosened dirt and keeps the water clean. The gyratator is countersunk into the tub. It will not tangle the clothes nor injure buttons. Phone for a trial washing. If it doesn't sell itself, don't keep it.

Lake Tahoe

LAKE TAHOE—that noble sheet of the bluest of blue and the greenest of green water—lies near the summit of the Sierra Nevada mountains and straddles the boundary line between Nevada and California. It is the second deepest lake in America and the largest at its altitude, save one, in all the world.

It has a shore line of some 75 miles, an area of about 200 square miles with depths ranging from a few feet to a quarter of a mile and is over 6,000 feet above sea level.

The Indians were the original discoverers—Tahoe being Indian for "Big Water." John C. Fremont, the pathfinder, came upon it in 1844.

The rocky shore of the lake is bordered by great forests of cedar and pine trees which are walled in by high peaks, often snow covered, some of which pierce the sky to a height of about 11,000 feet.

The greatest and most fascinating charm of this "liquid mountain mirror" comes from the rare and changing beauty as the color combinations which make up the picture shift from hour to hour and day to day, according to the weather and with the coming or going of the sun, moon and clouds. 'Tis said to have "as many moods as a woman." Mountain shadows photograph themselves in its placid surface and produce fairy-like pictures. The grandest view of all, perhaps, comes when the opalescent colors of approaching sunset chase themselves across its surface and climax in an alpine glow.

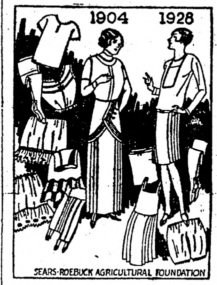
How Fashion Changes Affect Cotton Market



SEARS-ROEBUCK AGRICULTURAL FOUNDATION

When the slim, one-piece dress, the simple, close-fitting undergarments and the silk-from-top-to-toe hose replaced the starched, long-sleeved, high-necked shirtwaist, the voluminous, ruffled flounce petticoats and the substantial cotton stockings worn early in the 1900's, there was a marked decline in the consumption of cotton goods yardage for womens clothes, according to the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. Requirements of industries for cotton, however, have grown sufficiently in recent years to offset any effect of the marked style changes in clothing on per capita consumption which averaged 27.3 pounds from 1922 to 1927 compared with 26.6 pounds in the five crop years from 1905 to 1910.

Twenty years ago, women generally owned only one silk dress and this was carefully packed away, stuffed with paper to prevent cracking, and brought out for weddings or funerals. Cotton dresses, underwear and hose furnished the bulk of their wardrobes. Today, the situation is entirely changed for many women, as silk and rayon are crowding cotton out of the picture so far as clothing is concerned, and single cotton dresses hang in closets filled with silk garments.

Changes in fashion have been chiefly responsible for the decreased use of cotton clothes, although prices of raw cotton have been advancing while other textiles have been marked lower. In the past five years, the average cost of raw cotton was nearly 70 per cent more than in the five years preceding the war. Raw silk prices, at the present time on the other hand, are the lowest in ten years, and the rapid expansion in rayon production has brought lower prices for this fiber, also.

Industrial uses are absorbing an increasing proportion of the cotton supply, offsetting the decline in consumption of yard goods in the clothing trade. The rubber trade, the automobile industry, airplane manufacturers, and makers of wall coverings, artificial leather, and so on, are today using cotton sheetings, mulls, muslins, ducks, sateens, in ways unknown a quarter of a century ago. A half million bales go to the automobile tire makers each year, another quarter million goes to supply the grocery trade with bags, and 100,000 bales are required annually to make bags for cement. Cotton cloths are also used extensively in the construction and equipment of airplanes and the expansion of this industry will open up wider markets for cotton goods. All modes of transportation, railroads, steamships, even shoes, create a large market for cotton goods. New successes in making cotton goods waterproof have increased their use in raincoats.

The Medicine Wheel

ON A shoulder of Medicine mountain, in the Big Horn range in Wyoming, at an elevation about a mile and one-half above sea level, is the remains of an Indian relic of bygone days—known apparently to but a handful of white men, but long and favorably to certain Indian tribes, as the Medicine Wheel.

Stones of many sizes are arranged on the ground in a circle some 250 feet in circumference. In the center there is a small, low, stone house. Radiating from the house to the rim, like spokes in a wheel, are more than twenty rows of stones. At irregular distances around the outside of the rim are the ruins of six other smaller stone houses, all save one of which touch the rim.

The worn appearance of the trail up the mountain to this mysterious, out-of-the-way spot bears indication of great age and gives evidence of the fact that in ages long past large numbers of persons visited this "wheel." The name "Medicine Wheel," doubtless attached itself to this peculiar structure as an indication of its probable use. The mountain probably got its name by reason of the wheel. But, whether used as a Medicine Wheel or lodge, a temple of worship or a tribute to the departed, no living person appears to know.

For aught we know, countless pilgrims, in ages past, may have trudged many weary miles to participate in sacred events on this spot. One thing sure, it is unlike anything else that has been handed down to us.

Short Lessons in Dairying

LESSON 55

PRODUCTION: The everage well bred and well cared for dairy cow will praduce 300 pounds of butterfat a year. At the prevailing prices this means an income of $150 per cow a year. Cows vary greatly in their production—one cow may produce 300 pounds of fat a year—another cow only 150 pounds.

MANUFACTURING: A co-operative creamery can manufacture high quality butter only when it receives high quality cream. Fresh, sweet cream that has been run thru a clean separator and cooled in cold water immediatly after separating makes the highest quality butter.

MARKETING: Over-production lowers the price. Poor quality and lack of uniformity lowers the price. Overloading a few markets or overloading the market at certain times of year lowers the price. Speculation and gambling on the market lowers the price.

What Will you do

When your Children Cry for It

There is hardly a household that hasn't heard of Castoria! At least five million homes are never without it. If there are children in your family there's almost daily need of its comfort. And any night may find you very thankful there's a bottle in the house. Just a few drops, and that colic or constipation is relieved; or diarrhea checked. A vegetable product; a baby remedy meant for young folks. Castoria is about the only thing you have ever heard doctors advise giving to infants. Stronger medicines are dangerous to a tiny baby, however harmless they may be to grown-ups. Good old Castoria! Remember the name, and remember to buy it. It may spare you a sleepless, anxious night. It is always ready, always safe to use; in emergencies, or for everyday ailments. Any hour of the day or night that Baby becomes fretful, or restless. Castoria was never more popular with mothers than it is today. Every druggist has it.

Best Position for Sleep

The public health service says that, in general, any position in which one is comfortable is a satisfactory position for sleeping. It is, however, considered better to sleep on the right rather than on the left side because there is less strain on the heart. Sleeping on the back tends to cause pressure on the abdominal aorta which results, in some cases, in bad dreams.

Tyndale's Great Work

The printing of Tyndale's translation of the New Testament was completed at Worms (Germany) in 1526.

A Sour Stomach

In the same time it takes a dose of soda to bring a little temporary relief of gas and sour stomach, Phillips Milk of Magnesia has acidity completely checked, and the digestive organs all tranquilized. Once you have tried this form of relief you will cease to worry about your diet and experience a new freedom in eating.

This pleasant preparation is just as good for children, too. Use it whenever coated tongue or fetid breath signals need of a sweetener. Physicians will tell you that every spoonful of Phillips Milk of Magnesia neutralizes many times its volume in acid. Get the genuine, the name Phillips is important. Imitations do not act the same!

—15—

"Listen," he cut in earnestly, as though at last he were thoroughly satisfied that he had heard everything he wanted to hear, "I've been worried sick for fear that because of what I brought upon you you'd given up and gone bad. It worried me ten times worse than the death of that poor Harvey chap. I'm ever so glad things have come out for you as they have. I'll sleep better now and work better. I've got a small real estate business of my own that I'm trying to work up. Only a little of Dad's money in it, and I'm paying that out to him as fast as I make anything. I was so afraid for you because most people have such a fool idea that a man may be down but never out, while a girl, once she's down is out for good. I'm sure glad you didn't accept the popular cant about that."

"Then you—you respect me just as though I were a thoroughly good girl?"

"You bet I do—ten times more. A thoroughly good girl, ofttimes doesn't know what fire is like, and doesn't know what she might do if it burned her once. You've been through the flames and, to my way of thinking, came out untarnished.

"Do I think you're a good girl?—well, I like that—I, I—think you're ripping."

Suddenly Lolita felt her lashes all wet. A strange mistiness had also come to the eyes of the man across the table. They looked at each other and then looked out of the window in embarrassment.

Lolita had that strange feeling for a moment that comes to everyone at times as she looked out through the window at the pond and the trees mirrored in it; it was as though her mind were mentally photographing the scene. She felt that she would remember it, and the moment, all of her lifetime. She could have cried with the happiness of the knowledge that here was the third man she had found who believed in her despite everything that had happened. Truly, she felt, she had been lucky. If only every girl who had taken a misstep could find some one who still believed in her. What a difference it would make in so many lives. For several moments they both struggled for composure. Fred succeeded in regaining his first.

"I can't imagine," he began, "what the Gray Eyed One's interest in you is—I'm a little afraid it is probably not all altruistic. However, I may be wrong. And, at any rate, you've taken the wisest course. The fact that he has made no advances despite every possible opportunity to do so is, of course, significant; still, it may have been that he was awaiting the proper moment. I would follow out the course you have already chosen, it seems to be a very wise one, and eventually return his money to him. In fact, it would make me very happy if you'd let me loan you the money to pay him back at once. And, if there's anything else you need—" He reached into his pocket and handed her a card. "I want you to look to me, and I don't want you to misunderstand that, either. I'll simply loan you the money, and you can pay it back later from the proceeds of your stories."

"You're very kind," Lolita told him, "but I don't want to borrow from you, and I shan't ask you for help—ever. I'm on my own and I'm going to stay that way. It's the best way."

"You bet it is," he agreed enthusiastically."

"Won't you let me take you to your door?" he begged.

"No," she returned firmly. "I'm sorry, but I don't want anyone to know where I'm living now. It's right near here and I can very easily walk it."

"But you'll let me see you again?"

She hesitated and he read a "no" in her eyes.

"Please!" he begged. "The fact of the matter is, I haven't had you out of my mind for a whole day at a time since that dreadful morning. Gertrude didn't know where you were, or wouldn't tell me. I couldn't find you. I was wondering if it would do any good to put an ad in the personal columns of the newspapers. Please understand that you must let me see you again." She hesitated a long time, and what finally moved her was the thought of her own lonesomeness, her own wish to see Warrill. If it could hurt her as much as it did to want to see some one, it was sheer cruelty to inflict the same sort of thing needlessly on some one else.

"Well," she temporized. "I thought I'd come out for a walk in the park every morning about ten o'clock; if you'd care to meet me here tomorrow about—"

"May I bring my car and take you for a ride?"

"Yes," agreed Lolita, "I think I'd like that, but you mustn't for one moment think . . ." they were out in the park path again now.

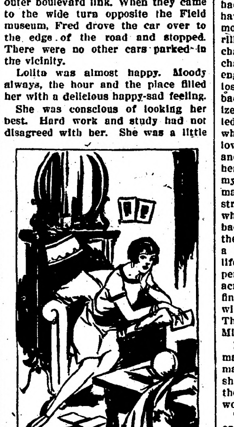
"Believe me," he said, as she stopped, indicating that she wished him to leave her now so that she might continue on home. "I think that you're just about the most Wonderful Girl In All The World." With that he tipped his hat, smiled warmly, turned and walked off. Instead of feeling like like smiling, Lolita felt like crying. If only it could have been Mr. Warrill who had stood there and said that! It seemed that life was always hard.

• • • • • • •

As the days went by, Lolita found herself very often sailing along the boulevards in Fred Watterson's car. It was practically the only recreation that she had, and she was grateful to him for providing it. At first she had hoped that she might help Fred in some way in return for the enjoyment that his company gave her. She tried to encourage him in thinking that he could make his own way, live down the old life that he had led—and the change in him seemed to be bona fide, for he was the soul of courtesy and gentlemanliness, but it appeared that he wanted her more than her encouragement. One day, toward the latter part of May, they took a long drive out through the South side, stopping for luncheon, and then returning toward the North side along the new outer boulevard link. When they came to the wide turn opposite the Field museum, Fred drove the car over to the edge of the road and stopped. There were no other cars parked in the vicinity.

Lolita was almost happy. Moody always, the hour and the place filled her with a delicious happy-sad feeling.

She was conscious of looking her best. Hard work and study had not disagreed with her. She was a little thinner, she knew, and her eyes were brighter, and there was an intensely and poignant quality in her always beautiful little face which she knew was not lost upon Fred. Turning to her after a long, contemplative silence, he said without preliminary:



This Had Been the Program for Some Weeks.

"Lolita, I love you." This literally took her breath away. She was wholly unprepared for it. She felt embarrassed. Ashamed. As though she had taken some sort of advantage of him. He hurried on.

"I hope you'll believe that I've truly changed—really I have; and there's no danger that I shall ever 'revert to type,' Harvey's death, and my love for you have made me see life as I never saw it before, and there will be no relapse into old ways. I want you to be my wife." Suddenly Lolita raised her hands to her face and painful sobs tore their way out without warning. He was all contrition at once.

"Oh, my dear, please, please!" he begged. "Don't cry like that. What is it?" His arms were about her. Turning her face up to his he kissed her full on the mouth, hugged her tightly, let his lips drift over her cheeks and throat. At last she pushed him away.

"I—wish—Fred," she managed jerkily, "that—I could—love you—but I can't; I'm—I'm so sorry!" Releasing her he leaned back in his seat to contemplate her with a white face.

"There is some one else?" he guessed almost immediately.

"Yes," she told him honestly, "there is some one else."

"Are you engaged to him?"

"No, he, he's engaged to some one else—is to be married in June to her—a girl who hurt me dreadfully."

"I see," said Fred, with some relief manifest in his tone; "then I may still call on you, and help you to forget this, er—other person?"

"Yes, I will still meet you, when you feel that you can take the time from your business—if you really want me to, but, frankly, Fred, I'm afraid that I could never love or marry anyone else—"

"I'll take the chance," he rejoined with grim determination.

After that he drove her to the place in the park, where they always met and parted, and then drove off.

Lolita hurried on to the house where her room was, and went upstairs, determined to put her mind upon her work and her studies. It was discouraging how the weeks instead of diminishing her longing for Warrill only strengthened it. Had she known that on a newsstand not a block away lay a magazine containing a story of Warrill's wherein he cleverly had a male character assume much the role that he had assumed that night in her room, wild horses would not have kept her from buying the magazine immediately and reading the story; and, had she read the story, she would have been made deliriously happy, and more than a little sad, for in it Warrill contrived to have his feminine character named Lolita and his male character Donald, and Donald, after engaging himself to marry an heiress, lost Lolita and longed for her to come back to him, saying, "Doesn't she realize that the moment of weakness that led me to think that I might marry wholly for money and turn aside from love is past, that I am truly sorry, and contrite and ashamed and want her (Lolita) back again with all of my heart and soul? She herself has made mistakes. She is trying to strengthen and broaden her character, why cannot she bear with me, come back to me, forgive me, marry me, and then we could both help each other to a firmer, broader understanding of life." He had written the story in desperation, hoping that she would come across it, after all other attempts to find her had failed. His engagement with Miss Pringle had been broken off. The papers had not mentioned it, at Miss Pringle's request.

However, Lolita did not know of the magazine story; and, as it was in a magazine that she never read, since she had no hopes of selling it a story, there was little likelihood that she would find it.

Turning to her mail, she opened five or six envelopes only to find her stories and rejection slips in all of them.

This had been the program for some weeks. Constant reading, not only of books upon writing, but upon philosophy and psychology, the writer's two standbys, had so improved her that it was almost unacceptable to the cheap magazines for whom she had first started to write, and she had not yet been able to make the grade into better sorts of publications.

Her courage, however, had not deserted her; the serial was nearing completion, and if that sold she knew she would have plenty of money; and, in the meantime, she had hopes for a novelette she had sent off to a publication that had accepted practically everything that she ever had sent it.

The following morning, a little worn-out by overwork, and a little ill from the necessity of paying very little for meals, and skipping one now and then, she decided that human companionship, of any kind, would cheer her up tremendously. Calling up Gertrude at the Emporium, she made an appointment with her for lunch.

Meeting Gertrude they walked over to the lunchroom. Selecting a table by a window they ordered and Gertrude began immediately to chatter.

"Good G—d, girlie, where have you been?"

"Working like the devil," returned Lolita wanly.

"You don't look well."

"No, I don't feel well. You see, I don't eat regularly, I'm an author." This caused Gertrude to laugh mightily.

"You, an author! That's hot. But, on the level, are you broke?"

"Yes, nearly. I can't treat you; I can barely afford to pay for my own lunch, so it will have to be a Dutch treat."

"Like h—ll it will," said Gertrude fiercely, "this is on me, and don't you forget it. Remember, I haven't got any room rent to pay."

"Did you know that Fred Watterson was back?" Lolita next asked her.

"Yes, but I've only seen him once; he wanted to know where you were."

"He's been taking me riding almost daily."

"For crying out loud! I didn't know that he was on your trail again. It's too bad the ship didn't sink."

Special Effort Only Can Give Supremacy

Strength is a matter of effort. You cannot hope for great strength, or athletic strength, or any high degree of vigor, as the result of namby-pamby types of exercise. You cannot hope to become a wrestler by playing croquet. You cannot become a champion sprinter by the practice of walking. The piano mover has more muscular vigor than the bookkeeper, and the bookkeeper has more mental strength than the piano mover. Moral or spiritual strength grows with its exercise. And then again, athletic strength is acquired through athletic effort. It is almost axiomatic that the kind of strength you develop, and the amount of it, will be determined by the kind of effort and the extent of the effort put forth in training, Carl Eaton Williams writes, in Physical Culture Magazine. If you concentrate your training upon one kind of athletic activity, it does not follow that your training will fit you for some quite contrary type of effort.

Quart of Water Cleans Kidneys

Take a Little Salts If Your Back Hurts, or Bladder Is Troubling You

No man or woman can make a mistake by flushing the kidneys occasionally, says a well-known authority. Eating too much rich food creates acids, which excite the kidneys. They become overworked from the strain, get sluggish and fail to filter the waste and poisons from the blood. Then we get sick. Rheumatism, headaches, liver trouble, nervousness, dizziness, sleeplessness and urinary disorders often come from sluggish kidneys.

The moment you feel a dull ache in the kidneys, or your back hurts, or if the urine is cloudy, offensive, full of sediment, irregular of passage or attended by a sensation of scalding, begin drinking a quart of water each day, also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any pharmacy; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast and in a few days your kidneys may act fine.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to flush and stimulate the kidneys; also to help neutralize the acids in the system, so they no longer cause irritation, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink which everyone should take now and then to help keep the kidneys clean and active and the blood pure, thereby often avoiding serious kidney complications.

SAME PRESCRIPTION HE WROTE IN 1892

When Dr. Caldwell started to practice medicine, back in 1875, the needs for a laxative were not as great as today. People lived normal lives, ate plain, wholesome food, and got plenty of fresh air. But even that early there were drastic physics and purges for the relief of constipation which Dr. Caldwell did not believe were good for human beings.

The prescription for constipation that he used early in his practice, and which he put in drug stores in 1892 under the name of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, is a liquid vegetable remedy, intended for women, children and elderly people, and they need just such a mild, safe bowel stimulant.

This prescription has proven its worth and is now the largest selling liquid laxative. It has won the confidence of people who needed it to get relief from headaches, biliousness, flatulence, indigestion, loss of appetite and sleep, bad breath, dyspepsia, colds, fevers. At your druggist, or write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. BB, Monticello, Illinois, for free trial bottle.

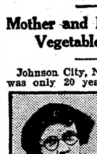
FIND "FRIEND IN NEED"

Mother and Daughter Praise Vegetable Compound



Johnson City, N. Y.—"My daughter was only 20 years old, but for two years she worked in misery. She was all run-down, nervous, had aches and pains and no appetite. I was taking Lydia E. I cannot praise your medicine too highly. It is wonderful for mothers and for daughters. It's surely 'a friend in need'."—MRS. L. E. HALL, 223 Floral Avenue, Johnson City, N. Y.

MAN THRIVES WITH HIS STOMACH OUT

Surgical Marvel Performed in England.

London.—A man can live and thrive without a stomach, provided that not too many of the pancreatic glands are cut away. This has been proved by an operation of removing the stomach and stitching the upper part of the small intestine to the gullet, performed in the Batley hospital in Leeds and now reported in the British Medical Journal.

The man on whom the operation was carried out was in such a condition that the removal of the stomach gave him his only chance of life. The doctors decided to give him that chance, and cut away the stomach bit by bit until it was completely removed.

As some of the pancreatic glands could be saved, the patient was not without digestive juices and soon could take nourishment. After 24 hours he took some water, and the quantities were gradually increased. Then milk and tea were added, and at the end of 10 days he could have as much food as he asked for. Solid food was taken at the end of a fortnight.

After a month the man was out of bed and eating ordinary food, though in small quantities and often. An X-ray examination after five months showed that the operation was entirely successful, and at present the patient appears to be in good health and able to do a reasonable amount of work. He enjoys his food. The operation is regarded as a surgical marvel.

Gold Seekers Will Take Canoes in Air

New York.—Canoes as airplane equipment will be used for the first time next summer when the Dominion Explorers, Ltd., begin their projected four-year aerial gold exploration of the Canadian Northwest.

Capt. Charles Sutton, chief pilot, who came here to purchase three more cabin monoplanes for the explorers' caravan, told how preparatory work with four pontoon-fitted planes last summer demonstrated the advantage of taking canoes along for ready transportation on the lakes and streams.

Captain Sutton plans to test canoe-carrying under practical conditions here within two weeks.

With double bottoms built into them, the pontoons are provided with a longitudinal water-tight compartment as a double protection against puncture. Should one of the surfaces become damaged against a submerged rock in landing on the uncharted lakes and streams, the pontoon would fill only half full of water and be enabled to take off again without emergency repair.

Greenwich Village Goes a-Calling in Pajamas

New York.—Making calls in pajamas is now a convenient commonplace in Greenville Village. Young couples get ready for bed and then put on their overcoats and sally forth to other attics and studio apartments for a midnight chat.

It's wholesome, healthful and as respectable as can be. Pajamas cover more of the anatomy than do evening gowns, and they conceal the figure rather than reveal it. They give wives that cozy, domestic look.

Pajama parties, formerly undertaken as a lark, are not infrequent now, nor are they considered fantastic, exotic or any of those things. They make a pleasant, comfortable way of dress. Light, colorful and fancy are pajamas, and the doctors approve them.

Few Visitors Admitted to London Exchange

London.—Admittance to the London stock exchange is limited to members, authorized clerks and "blue buttons," or holders of recognized passes, and any seeking entrance without possessing qualifications is in for a rough time at the hands of lynx-eyed bouncers. A fourth class, called "sewer rats," is admitted to the basement, but this is limited to junior clerks who daily check bargains.

Distinguished visitors are sometimes shown around, but they, like the "blue buttons," are not permitted to deal. One of the most distinguished guests was King Feisul of Iraq, who was taken in to hear dealers shouting "Anglo-Egyptians" and "Sudan Plantations."

MEN ARE SAFER THAN WOMEN AS DRIVERS

Facts Established During Year's Tests.

Washington.—The perennial family argument as to whether man or woman drivers get into more automobile accidents can at last be backed up with some facts and figures that indicate sex differences.

Records of man and woman taxicab drivers in a Pennsylvania city have been watched for an entire year by Dr. Morris Viteles and Helen M. Gardner of the University of Pennsylvania.

The results, reported in the Personnel Journal, show that the woman taxi drivers were responsible for three times as many accidents as men, though, judging by claims following accidents, the women were more successful in keeping out of serious trouble.

These men and women operated the same kind of car and all equipment was regularly overhauled. Both drove in stormy weather and in the same traffic conditions.

Women Were Less Experienced.

The men, however, were more experienced, on the whole, than the women, for some of the women were not experienced drivers when hired, but were given a thorough course of training and immediately placed on cabs. This would seem to be an important psychological factor, but the taxicab company records could not be kept in such detail as to show whether the new driver offsets inexperience with excessive caution or whether this caution oversteps the mark and leads to an excessive number of cases of collisions.

About 2,000 men drivers were on the employment rolls at a time and about forty women. The men drove 28,431,719 miles in the year and had 7,311 accidents. The women drove 348,979 miles and had 268 accidents. In terms of revenue the women had three and one-half times as many accidents per thousand dollars as the men.

Women Dodge Accident Claims.

A special study of accident costs in one representative month showed that there were 191 claims in the accidents of man drivers and four claims in cases involving woman drivers. The claims indicate that women got into less serious mixups than the men, for the total cost of claims against men was $14,605, as compared with $75 against woman drivers.

The psychologists conclude that the figures from the study "favor the point of view that the present generation of woman drivers is more susceptible to accidents than the present generation of man drivers."

They also state: "The extent to which this is the result of relative inexperience in driving or of a sex-determined difference in susceptibility to accidents in traffic cannot be finally determined from an examination of the present data. The fact, however, that a sampling of women suffer more accidents when driving under the same conditions as a somewhat similar sampling of men is clearly established."

Seeks to Minimize Tin in Silk Dresses

State College, Pa.—Silken dresses already are light in weight, but they may be made even lighter through research started by Miss Winifred Mather Forbes Pennsylvania State college.

She is investigating the amount of metal necessary for weighting silken garments to enable them to keep their form. Tin is used often for this purpose. Excessive weighting is said to shorten the life of the fabric. Dresses ranging in price from $6 to $12 sometimes carry more than 50 per cent of their weight in tin.

Miss Forbes' work will be under a fellowship awarded by the textile section of the American Home Economics association.

French to Demonstrate Value of Air Ambulance

Washington.—The airplane, which has already proved its worth as a passenger, mail and express carrier, is now to become an ambulance. An international congress will assemble in Paris next May to consider air transportation of sick and injured in both military and civil life, the Commerce department has been advised by its representative there. Actual demonstration of the airplane ambulance will be given at Le Bourget field, where a pseudo patient will be bundled aboard, carried to some provincial village, and returned.

Asserts All Creatures Create Cosmic Waves

Paris.—Claim of discovery of a new group of waves, or "cosmic rays," generated and sent out by humans and all other living creatures, is made by Georges Lakhovsky, protege of Prof. Arsene d'Arsonval of the Academy of Medicine.

His theory is that the waves may be likened to electric currents, controlling health and sickness in plants and man.

INDIAN MAP ONLY CLEW TO TREASURE

Kentucky Man Leases Land to Hunt Cave.

Lexington, Ky.—Six barrels full of precious silver and coins valued at about $400,000 is the objective of J. D. Stamper, who has taken a lease on land in Carter county, about 80 miles from Lexington, where the treasure is reported to be.

Mr. Stamper said: "I feel confident the treasure is there and that I will find it. I am the only man that has ever found all the earthmarks noted on the map and that actually came across a cave such as described in my treasure map."

The treasure is said to have been buried by Indians who left Kentucky after the arrival of the white man. Silver was plentiful with the redskins, and when they made their hasty exit they buried the treasure in a cave in Carter county.

They drew a map of the cave, its location and the ground marks that distinguished it, and in 1811 one Robert King, a fugitive from Europe, came upon a band of Indians camped in Kentucky. King made himself at home with the tribe.

King had no intention of leaving Kentucky with the Indians, and when the tribe left they gave him the buckskin treasure map as a farewell gift.

King searched for the treasure, but was forced to give up, due to lack of aid. When he died in that vicinity he gave the map to an Indian by the name of Robert Tinder. Tinder was unable to find the cave, and when he felt the approach of death called an old friend, J. A. Rhoden, now living near Nevada, Ohio, to his bedside and gave him the map.

Rhoden gave the map to Stamper, who is a native of Carter county and familiar with the land in the section where the cave is located.

"Hankered to Write" at 58; Back to School

Urbana, Ill.—Because he had a "hankering to write," Almanza S. Davis has turned his back on 30 years of army service to become the oldest undergraduate student at the University of Illinois.

This gray-haired veteran of fifty-eight, however, is no newcomer to the college world. He studied for the ministry before he served Uncle Sam in Germany, Alaska, Cuba and the Philippines. His theological studies were abruptly terminated in 1889 when Blackburn college authorities found a bottle of medicinal whisky in his room.

Davis was stationed at the university after more than twenty years abroad. In 1926 he was retired with the rank of technical sergeant.

Psychology and science claim most of his attention as a student, though he claims "too much schooling tends to destroy a man's initiative."

Gold-Lined Tomb Built for Argentine Family

Buenos Aires.—Simple and unpretentious in its exterior appearance, one family vault in the Chacarita cemetery holds a vast store of wealth.

It is completely lined with gold and cost approximately 1,000,000 pesos ($420,000). It also contains a small statue of a woman, a work of Bitolfi said to have cost 70,000 pesos. Frescos of inestimable value adorn the upper part of the golden walls. The vault was constructed 19 years ago by Angel Roverano.

Designs which were being worked out in the floor in small gold blocks were never completed, because the will of Roverano provided that the tomb must be closed on the death of his only surviving relative, a brother, who died several years ago.

"Buy a Bird" Is Slogan in Hawaii's Big Island

Hilo, Hawaii.—In order to further enhance the natural wild beauty and charm of the big island of the Hawaiian group, the chamber of commerce of Hilo is importing songbirds to increase the bird population of the island.

The number of birds to be imported is to be determined by the success of the organization's campaign to have every resident of the island "buy a bird."

No birds are to be kept in captivity.

Early Druggists

The earliest known forerunner of the modern druggist practiced his profession no fewer than 5,000 years ago, according to researches made into the history of pharmacy.

A stone tablet in possession of the British medical museum has been identified as a pharmaceutical prescription the approximate date of which is 3700 B. C.

This is the oldest existing trace of the evolution of pharmacy and dates 4,700 years before the first recorded apothecary shop in Europe was opened at Wetzlar, Germany.

Neal's Mother Has Right Idea

Within a few months there will be no more feverish, bilious, headachy, constipated, pale and puny children. That prophecy would surely come true if every mother could see for herself how quickly, easily, and harmlessly the bowels of babies and children are cleansed, regulated, given tone and strength by a product which has proved its merit and reliability to do what is claimed for it to millions of mothers in over fifty years of steadily increasing use.

As mothers find out from using it how children respond to the gentle influence of California Fig Syrup by growing stronger, sturdier and more active daily they simply have to tell other mothers about it. That's one of the reasons for its overwhelming sales of over four million bottles a year.

A Western mother, Mrs. Neal M. Todd, 1701 West 27th St., Oklahoma City, Okla., says: "When my son, Neal, was three years old he began having constipation. I decided to give him California Fig Syrup and in a few days he was all right and looked fine again. This pleased me so much that I have used Fig Syrup ever since for all his colds or little upset spells. It always stops his trouble quick, strengthens him, makes him eat."

Always ask for California Fig Syrup by the full name and see that the carton bears the word "California." Then you'll get the genuine.

YOU CAN'T DYE with Good Intentions

You can get results—after a fashion—with any old dye; but to do work you are proud of takes real anilines. That's why we put them in Diamond Dyes. They contain from three to five times more than other dyes on the market! Cost more to make? Surely. But you get them for the same price as other dyes.

Next time you want to dye, try them. See how easy it is to use them. Then compare the results. Note the absence of that re-dyed look; of streaking or spotting. See that they take none of the life out of the cloth. Observe how the colors keep their brilliance through wear and washing. Your dealer will refund your money if you don't agree Diamond Dyes are better dyes.

The white package of Diamond Dyes is the original "all-purpose" dye for any and every kind of material. It will dye or tint silk, wool, cotton, linen, rayon or any mixture of materials. The blue package is a special dye, for silk or wool only. With it you can dye your valuable articles of silk or wool with results equal to the finest professional work. When you buy—remember this. The blue package dyes silk or wool only. The white package will dye every kind of goods, including silk and wool. Your dealer has both packages.

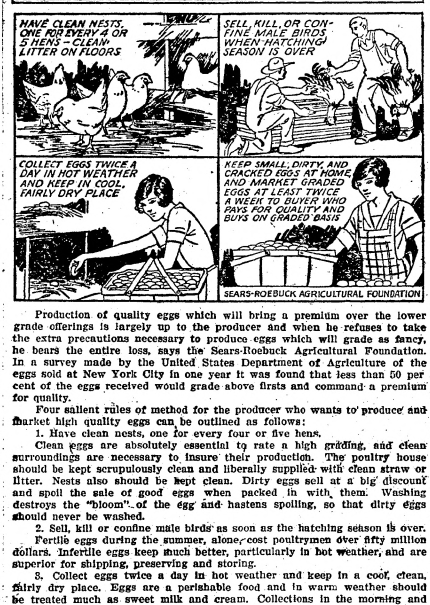
How to Produce and Market Quality Eggs



HAVE CLEAN NESTS, ONE FOR EVERY 4 OR 5 HENS — CLEAN LITTER ON FLOORS
SELL, KILL, OR CONFINE MALE BIRDS WHEN HATCHING SEASON IS OVER COLLECT EGGS TWICE A DAY IN HOT WEATHER AND KEEP IN COOL, FAIRLY DRY PLACE
KEEP SMALL, DIRTY, AND CRACKED EGGS AT HOME, AND MARKET GRADED EGGS AT LEAST TWICE A WEEK TO BUYER WHO PAYS FOR QUALITY AND BUYS ON GRADED BASIS
SEARS-ROEBUCK AGRICULTURAL FOUNDATION

Production of quality eggs which will bring a premium over the lower grade offerings is largely up to the producer and when he refuses to take the extra precautions necessary to produce eggs which will grade as fancy, he bears the entire loss, says the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. In a survey made by the United States Department of Agriculture of the eggs sold at New York City in one year it was found that less than 50 per cent of the eggs received would grade above firsts and command a premium for quality.

Four salient rules of method for the producer who wants to produce and market high quality eggs can be outlined as follows:

1. Have clean nests, one for every four or five hens.

Clean eggs are absolutely essential to rate a high grading, and clean surroundings are necessary to insure their production. The poultry house should be kept scrupulously clean and liberally supplied with clean straw or litter. Nests also should be kept clean. Dirty eggs sell at a big discount and spoil the sale of good eggs when packed in with them. Washing destroys the "bloom" of the egg and hastens spoiling, so that dirty eggs should never be washed.

2. Sell, kill or confine male birds as soon as the hatching season is over.

Fertile eggs during the summer, alone, cost poultrymen over fifty million dollars. Infertile eggs keep much better, particularly in hot weather, and are superior for shipping, preserving and storing.

3. Collect eggs twice a day in hot weather and keep in a cool, clean, fairly dry place. Eggs are a perishable food and in warm weather should be treated much as sweet milk and cream. Collections in the morning and again at night prevent eggs from remaining in nests very long and becoming heated. The cellar or basement, provided it is not too damp, is usually the best place to keep eggs until they are marketed.

4. Keep small, dirty and cracked eggs at home and market graded eggs at least twice a week to a buyer who pays for quality and buys on a graded basis.

Eggs, even of the best quality, if dirty, grade as dirties and bring low prices. In addition, the inclusion of a few dirty eggs spoils the sale of the others with which they are packed. These eggs should be consumed on the farm, where they bring "full market value." Many farmers are guilty of holding eggs for higher prices. This is particularly true in the autumn when prices start on a seasonal advance. Deterioration sets in and instead of bringing higher prices, the eggs grade lower and sell at a substantial discount. The widespread use of the automobile makes it easy for farmers to market eggs frequently, so that there is no excuse for eggs being held longer than three or four days, especially in hot weather.

More local dealers are buying on a graded basis, so that the producer who sells fine big eggs is paid a premium, the Foundation continues. If the dealer still insists in buying all eggs at one price, regardless of quality, the farmer should seek another outlet, such as a few customers with whom he deals direct, or a city commission firm which caters to a high-class trade.

Short Lessons in Dairying

LESSON 56

PRODUCTION: A ration consisting of 10 pounds of hay, 30 pounds of silage and 8 pounds of grain, may be estimated as the required amount of feed to produce 1 pound of butterfat a day. The amount of feed a cow requires depends upon the amount of milk produced, the per cent of fat in the milk and the size or weight of the cow.

MANUFACTURING: For a co-operative creamery to pay the highest price for butterfat, it must have over 250,000 pounds a year—it must make high quality butter—and must have good business management. Every farmer in the neighborhood of a co-operative creamery should be a patron and a stockholder and work for the things that make the creamery pay.

MARKETING: When farmers got together in co-operative creameries they started to build effective marketing machinery. When the co-operative creameries started to get together they started to make their marketing machinery work

Abandon Foolish Beliefs

One of the things many present-day men cannot understand is that it is their duty to give up old beliefs that are untrue, and that no harm will come from such abandonment. Many of our beliefs in 1928 are as foolish as the old mythological tales, wherein rivers left their beds to fight on the side of certain favorite heroes.—E. W. Howe's Monthly.

DR. CALDWELL'S THREE RULES

Dr. Caldwell watched the results of constipation for 47 years, and believed that no matter how careful people are of their health, diet and exercise, constipation will occur from time to time. Of next importance, then, is how to treat it when it comes. Dr. Caldwell always was in favor of getting as close to nature as possible, hence his remedy for constipation is a mild vegetable compound. It can not harm the most delicate system and is not habit forming.

The Doctor never did approve of drastic physics and purges. He did not believe they were good for human beings to put into their system. Use Syrup Pepsin for yourself and members of the family in constipation, biliousness, sour and crampy stomach, bad breath, no appetite, headaches, and to break up fevers and colds. Get a bottle today, at any drugstore and observe these three rules of health: Keep the head cool, the feet warm, the bowels open. For a free trial bottle, just write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. CHAPTER IX—Continued

"Oh, don't say that, he's quite changed. Doesn't drink; is working up his own business. He's so different I hardly believe you'd recognize him. He's asked me to marry him."

"Wh-a-a-t!" Gertrude's query could be heard the entire length of the room.

"Yes, he asked me to marry him, and I rejected him."

"Oh, oh, oh, you rejected two million dollars when you haven't got enough money to eat! I could crown you with a bottle. Why on earth did you turn him down?"

"Because I don't love him."

"Well, what of it? Nobody could love him, but think of the money."

"I hadn't thought of it; but now that you mention it, it would be nice. What a difference money does make. Still, even leaving that phase of the question out of it, I do rather like him. But I most certainly don't love him." Gertrude leaned across the table to speak earnestly.

"Now lookit, kid; don't you be any d—n fool. However, you look at the thing, and not wanting to hurt your feelings, let me say that after what's happened to you, you'll look different to most men if they find out about it—and they always do, somehow, sooner or later, find out those things—and they never forgive 'em. It's the handicap every woman has in life. Take it from me, if you've got a chance to grab a ring, you grab it. If you don't like the guy, it won't be any trouble at all to get something on him later and divorce him and knock him for a row of stocks and bonds for alimony. That reformation stuff is all the bunk. Oh, he may be serious enough about it and be fooling even himself, but take it from me, I know his breed. They take a notion to reform about every five years or so, but it never sticks. You'd do better to marry him, not loving him, than to marry some one whom you did love. For every reason in the world, if you can get young Watterson, you grab him—take it from one who, etc., etc., etc., I guess I don't need to explain." Lolita was a little moved by the other's ungrammatical forensic despite herself, and the fact that she was a little moved—though not by the argument per se—was to her significant. What got under her skin was the thought that should she marry Watterson, she would have plenty of leisure for solid study and real worthwhile writing, and the fact that this thought did touch her made her see in a vivid new light just how Warrill had thought and felt.

Thoughtfully, as she walked toward her room, she remembered the last words that had passed between Gertrude and herself after luncheon; she remembered and wondered just how much she had really meant by them: Gertrude had said at parting:

"You take me seriously, now, and cultivate this chap Watterson while he's in a marrying mood?"

"Well, maybe," had been her reply.

CHAPTER X

The following morning, Sunday, was a beautiful bright day. Lolita had an appointment with Watterson at one o'clock. They were to have lunch together. Thoughtfully she recalled her remark to Gertrude the day before. Watterson, she knew, could be made to propose again today by the slightest word or look.

Her room rent, she reflected, was due in the morning, and she had not the money to pay it. Had, altogether, only fifty-seven cents; she had counted it carefully the night before.

She dressed with infinite care, picking out the prettiest and most becoming of the things that she found presentable. The result was not wholly satisfactory. Her clothes were beginning to have that worn, rumpled look.

She happened to glance at the calendar. In two more days it would be the first of June. Warrill would be married in the first week of June. She would, in all probability, not see him again as long as she lived. With each increasing week and month it seemed that life got harder and harder.

In order to conserve to the ultimate the fifty-seven cents remaining to her she decided to walk down to the meeting place. This would take the better part of an hour and necessitated starting at once. Drying her eyes she powdered again carefully and set out.

At a street corner a familiar voice spoke at her elbow:

"How do you do, Miss Forbes?" Lolita looked up in surprise into the face of Miss Truxton.

"Why," she breathed in some embarrassment, "how do you do?"

Miss Truxton fell into step beside her. She was a woman of thirty-five or forty, of whom Gertrude had once said, "there's no possible chance that she'll ever go wrong—nobody would help her." Nevertheless, Lolita thought that there was something almost beautiful about her this morning; she had never seen her look that way in the store.

"I've often wondered what became of you," Miss Truxton confided in a level tone. "You were always such a pretty little thing."

"Well," returned Lolita a little cynically, "if you read the papers and believed—"

"Yes, I read them, but I didn't believe them. There was always something about you that led me to suspect that even under the circumstances you'd come out on top somehow."

"I'm far from the top," laughed Lolita, "but, on the other hand, I am not exactly on the bottom, either." Miss Truxton laughed gaily at this.

"I've often wanted to ask Gertrude about you; but Gertrude and I barely speak to each other. She thinks that I am an unexperienced prude and know nothing about life. And I've always been afraid to be the least bit friendly with her anyway, for fear she'd take advantage of it and lay down on the job—she's an excellent saleslady if she's held tightly in hand."

Lolita smiled to herself and asked a daring question.

"After all, what do you know about life, Miss Truxton?"

For some reason this question caused Lolita's former boss to laugh unrestrainedly.

"You'd be surprised, my dear—that is, if I were to tell you; but I shan't, except to say that when I was a good deal younger I had much the same experience that you had with that Torrence person. In fact, the man I have in mind was so much like Harvey Torrence. It must be hard for the devil to tell them apart now. I learned about life from him, and no other man has ever gotten within slapping distance of me since that time. However, I was foolish . . . terribly foolish in letting my experience with one man cause me to hate all men. Shortly after it occurred another man wanted me to marry him. I was a fool not to do it. Personally, I think that men ought to be abolished, but as they exist, the best way is to marry a half-way decent one if you can find such, and then do the best you can with him."

"You mean, even if you don't love him?"

"Most particularly, if you don't love him. The best thing to do about a man you love is to run from him as from the plague—he'll torture you. Pick out a sober, respectable, reliable one, and thank your lucky stars for him."

"I wonder if you're right?" mused Lolita aloud.

"I gather from that," went on Miss Truxton swiftly, "that you already have a prospect."

"Yes, I'm on my way to meet him at the present moment."

"Well, salt him down before some other seiner scoops him up." Lolita laughed and then grew suddenly serious as a new thought struck her.

"Would you take me back at the store?" she asked.

Miss Truxton looked down at her curiously.

"Yes, I would; you were an excellent salesgirl, and no one would remember the first-class news you provided for the papers except the girls around the place, and they'd get over the shock the first day—Lord knows few of them have any right to talk about you—but, in heaven's name, why go back there? I couldn't pay you any more than you were getting before."

"I just wanted to know whether or not I could come back. I'm pretty well up against it for money. I may have to. It's been nice to see you again."

"Good-by," smiled Miss Truxton, swinging on.

Watterson was waiting for her. At the end of the luncheon they started for a drive and at a little park he stopped the car and, reaching down into his pocket, brought up a purple plush box, the sight of which struck terror to Lolita's heart. Opening it he displayed a diamond solitaire which nearly took Lolita's breath away. She fingered it lovingly, put it carefully upon the wrong finger and held it out at arm's length. Suddenly she was in his arms, and he was covering her face with kisses:

"My dear; Oh! my dear," he murmured, with passionate overtones in his voice beyond anything Lolita had ever heard before, "I love you so—won't you marry me?" It was on the tip of Lolita's tongue to say yes; but something stopped her.

"I'll give you my answer tomorrow, if you'll meet me as usual, about ten o'clock." And with this she made him be content, though he begged her for something more definite. Again and again he kissed her, and Lolita shut her eyes and tried to be thrilled by it, and did succeed in being thrilled, but only by the thought of how wonderful it would be were it Mr. Warrill.

At length he drove her back to her room.

After reading for several hours, and working up a current assignment on the writing course, Lolita lay down, fully dressed, upon the bed, and for hours gave herself up to thoughts wholly unpleasant. In the morning her room rent would be due, and she had no money with which to pay it. After she had bought breakfast she would have no money left at all. Certain it was that she would have to do one of three things: marry Watterson, go to work at the Emporium, or, get in touch with Gray Eyes and ask him for help. The latter exigency she mentally crossed out of the hazards at once—Mr. Warrill would not like it. Still, that was silly, somehow Mr. Warrill wouldn't care a whoop even if she married Watterson. It was all quite impossible.

She rose and undressed rapidly and, tried to go to sleep. The very depth of her despair, however, finally roused something deep within her nature which had started to grow the night that she had refused to accept Warrill on his own terms. Since then it had been growing steadily; now, whatever it was, it came to her rescue. She sat up in the dark, jaws tightly clicked together, hands clenched.

"I'll be d—d if I'll give in," she said aloud to herself. "I won't marry Watterson, it wouldn't be fair to him; I won't crawl back to work at the Emporium, that wouldn't be fair to myself, and I won't call on Gray Eyes for help. I'll fight it out, somehow, some other way. Anybody can quit and lay down. If I'm ever going to be somebody, I can't afford to let myself act like 'anybody!'" With grim determination and a brave little song in her heart, she rose, turned on the light, snatched the cover off her typewriter, read the last chapter of her serial, consulted notes on a new chapter and set furiously to work. Hours later she dropped on the bed, exhausted, an excellent chapter finished. Sleep came to her instantly.

The following morning she rose late and dressed in a leisurely fashion to delay the moment when she should have to look on the hall tree downstairs to see what the mailman had brought her. Having had no supper the night before she felt a little weak and exhausted physically, but, mentally, the courage which had come to her in the night was still functioning. There was a grim set to her mouth which would have amazed her father. It made her look years older and stronger, and transformed her sheer prettiness into something deeper that was very close to beautiful. Even she, as she fastened a little bow on her chemise and caught a glimpse of her eyes in the mirror, saw a new depth in them.

Walking downstairs she looked upon the halltree. There were several postal cards and a letter or two, all of these addressed to other roomers in the house—nothing for her.

Hurrying on out, lest the landlady come and find her in the hall and ask for the rent, she went to a little restaurant and ordered rolls and coffee, which she ate right down to the last crumb. An hour later, after a brisk walk, she met Watterson. He did not even ask her what her answer was—somehow he read it instantly in her eyes.

"You'll still let me see you, though, won't you, Lolita?"

"Well," she temporized, "I don't know. I can never marry you; and it seems to me that it would be better for you if we were not to meet again. I've always been afraid that it's taken too much time from your work."

Liners All Equipped for Church Services

Aboard the great ocean liners church altars are considered an indispensable detail of the equipment. A generation ago religious services at sea were held irregularly, depending on the chance presence of a clergyman. Now transatlantic liners hold Roman Catholic and Protestant services at sea on Sunday.

Passengers from all cabins meet at the church services. Invitations to the service are commonly posted throughout the ship every Sunday morning. The priest or clergyman officiating is usually assisted by ship stewards acting as sacristans. One large line that operates many steamers in the transatlantic service has a Roman Catholic altar on board each vessel. The linen used on the altars is prepared by Sisters of Charity in the ports of call on either side of the Atlantic. The altar cloths used in the Church of England services are cared for by churches in New York and in the European ports of call.

Cold Bath in Morning

California jays are fond of eggs of wild birds or domestic fowl, and are even more partial to newly hatched nestlings, says Nature Magazine. They are to be commended for their care of their own kind and for their habits of personal cleanliness, evidenced by their cold morning bath which is a usual before breakfast performance.

More than one-third of the people in the United States are without public library service.

A BACHELOR CHANGES HIS MIND

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

HUGH MUNSON was a bachelor. He was most emphatic in his statements that he would remain a bachelor to the last. And that he had reached the age of forty-three without marrying and would travel through the rest of his days unmarried. He wanted to be free. . . . to explore hitherto unexplored lands . . . to come and go as his fancy willed. Who would want a better home than a hotel? Who would want more comforts than the service obtained in such places? He scorned the tidy little houses of his friends . . . gingerly patted the heads of their offsprings and then put a definite distance between himself and their sticky hands. He didn't want a house to be responsible for . . . electric light bills . . . furnace cleaners . . . faulty plumbing . . . maids . . . whooping cough . . . insurance policies . . decorators.

" . . . and that's final," he had declared decisively from the depths of a big chair in his sister's living room on the first evening of his return from a two years' trip to Africa. "I—shall—never—marry. The next six months I will spend here writing up my last trip for my publishers and then I'm off again . . . free as the wind . . ." He turned to his nephew, Robert Beveridge, who occupied another big chair near by. "You will be my heir, Bobbie, my boy . . . that is, if you will get this notion out of your head about going in business instead of taking up law as your mother wants you to do."

His nephew smiled as he crushed a cigarette butt against the ash tray.

"You're a fine one to talk, Unk. Grandfather wanted you to be a minister—mother told me so—and besides, he was in favor of marriage and look at you—just a vagabond of the winding road, except that you have enough money to buy railroad and steamer tickets. I don't want to be a lawyer, but I'll compromise with you, you old fossil! I'll make a wager with you that before six months are up—you will be asking some girl to marry you . . . to share your name and fortune. A new roadster against my pledge that I will go to college this fall and study law that within the next six months you'll fall in love and fall hard! You have been out of touch with civilization so long you don't know what white women look like, but just you—wait. That's fair, isn't it, mother?"

Hugh Munson's sister smiled indulgently, and nodded. The traveler laughed. "All right, shake on it! A new roadster—any color—any make, against your promise to be a lawyer—but I've won before we start. Love—marriage—bah! Responsibilities? Not for me!"

A maid came to the door, followed by a short, smiling faced little woman whose open coat displayed a white linen uniform.

"Hello, folks. I'm on a case down in the next block—typhoid, and was out for a breath of air so thought I'd run in. Oh why, Hugh Munson, you old tramp! I haven't seen you since . . . let me see, when we three were in high school together . . . how many years ago . . ."

"And if it isn't Cara Smedley . . . or what is the name, now, Cara? I recall Marion telling me a long time ago of your marriage . . . ."

"Listen, Hugh. Wesley died last year, you know. And I'm working again . . . ."

"And supporting the loveliest family of four children you ever saw. How is Billie, and Junie, and baby and Albert, Cara? My goodness, but Albert is getting so tall and manly."

"All fine," answered the family's smiling mother. "Billie fell off the porch yesterday and bumped his nose and Junie looks like chicken pox and baby cries for an hour straight every time I leave her and Albert spends all his nickels at the candy store, but outside of that, they are just beautiful, every one of them!"

Robert Beveridge looked across the table at his mother one morning and his eyes were troubled.

"Well, mother, guess the odds are against me. You'll have a lawyer son after all, I guess. That old Beau Brummel brother of yours! He is a knockout in evening clothes and all the girls are crazy about him. Kay says she has tried all her wiles on him—nothing doing! Marjorie tells me he calls her 'child' and patronizes her! Kay says he is the hardest man in New York to flirt with although he dances with her all the time and tells her she is pretty and would like to kidnap her and all that bosh that middle-aged men hand out to pretty girls. Kay is getting tired of the conspiracy, I guess. We didn't think he would be so hard to win over. We are going to have Estelle Taton out to Marjorie's house party next week and Estelle will bowl him over. . . She's a stunner, and just begged for an introduction the other night at the club. Says Unk is her idea of handsome, distinguished . . . and all that stuff!"

Estelle's charms proved all in vain. Hugh Munson played golf with her, rode horseback with Marjorie Norris, sang with Delicia Evans, danced with Kay Vandergrift and talked China with Mary Manning. They all vied for his favor. The house party broke up sooner than was expected, because he announced his intention of driving back to New York at noon instead of late evening. When he left Kay and Marjorie were in the seat with him, and Delicia and Mary were in the rumble seat.

The confirmed bachelor-explorer donned evening clothes three nights a week and accompanied his nephew and members of Robert's set into the gay whirl of New York's night life. He seemed to thoroughly enjoy himself. He continued to write in an effort to appease the demands of an anxious publisher, and at the end of the fifth month, Robert wrote to the university for their curriculum.

Kay was again wearing his frat pin. Marjorie was hinting of her engagement to Alex Treadgold, long and ardent suitor; Delicia had decided to go on the stage, and always generous, Hugh Munson had offered to back her. She had refused with tear-filled eyes. Estelle Tanton was planning a winter in Europe and had hinted that she would expect Hugh to stop and see her when he was on the continent, although he had not mentioned his impending journey.

Robert was sitting before the fireplace reading the recently arrived literature from college. His mother was reading close by. Hugh Munson came in, and with his hands deep in his pockets, he stood before the fireplace and faced his sister and nephew.

"What's the booklet, Bobbie, my lad?" he asked.

"Oh, you win, you old woman-hating antique! I never did think you would hold out with all those girl—but you win! I'm going to college—and study law! Mother benefits anyway through our bet. And she has promised me the car that you were going to buy me, after you proposed to one of the girls."

"That car," spoke Hugh Munson slowly, "will be delivered early in the morning, Bobbie, and you might drive your mother down to the station to see Cara and me off on our wedding trip. We will be gone only a week, on account of the babies! Can't leave them alone with a maid very long. You knew, Marion, that Junie is a smart little tike and baby—why, she just yells when I come in the door and stretches out her hands to me. Wish you would look in on them while we are away; we'll feel better if we know you are keeping an eye on our family—and if you hear of a good nurse, tell her to come up and see me when we get back. Cara is to have an easier time from now on. And Albert says he is going to own a garage when he finishes school. Can you beat that? And say, Marion, if you know of a good plumber, tell him to go and look at the bathroom on the third floor, there is something wrong and I didn't have time to attend to it."

Motorist Says Fox Can Run 30 Miles an Hour

Further light on the speed with which animals can run is found in the experience of a Washington motorist over a side road of the Eastern shore. This motorist is ready to state that a fox can run at least 30 miles an hour.

It came about when the motorist, driving along leisurely, saw something running in a field to the right of the road and sped up a bit to see what it might be.

Just as he came to the end of a hedge along the road, the fox jumped out into the middle of the road, intent on reaching a cornfield on the other side. Seeing the car and perhaps, even more startling to him, hearing it, for it was well equipped with rattles and squeaks, he made a hurried break for the cornfield, but found a barbed wire fence blocking his way. Turning in a panic, it sped down the middle of the road, its body almost touching the ground as it stretched out in a swift run.

Accelerating, the motorist came within a few feet of the fox and then maintained the gap separating them. The speed increased until the car was making 30 miles an hour, with the fox just a few jumps ahead.

Whether the fox could have "stepped on it" a bit more is not known for the motorist allowed the fox to set the pace. Perhaps if the animal had been pressed, it might have stretched the speed up a few miles an hour. The race continued for perhaps a quarter of a mile, when the fox seeing a gap in the fence, went through it in two or three quick jumps, then slowed down to a sort of high-bouncing run, and was soon lost in the corn.

Famous London Bridges

Old London bridge, begun about 1170, was completed in 1209. It carried a row of timber houses, which were frequently burned down, but the main structure existed until the beginning of the Nineteenth century. The old bridge was the center for booksellers and other tradesmen. On it stood the chapel of St. Thomas of Canterbury and a tower on which the heads of traitors were exposed to view. The present London bridge was begun in 1824, and completed in 1831. It is borne on five granite arches, is 928 feet long, 65 feet wide, and 56 feet above the river.

Lemming an Odd Creature

The head of a scientific expedition into the Arctic region reports that they were unable to obtain many of the small land mammals, as trapping is impracticable during the brief stops and under the midnight sun. The past year or two has been notable for a shortage of all smaller mammals, particularly Arctic hares and lemmings. The lemmings occur at times in countless millions, forming abundant food for foxes, and their recurring periods of scarcity and abundance are reflected in the fur returns of the Arctic region.

This Little Girl Got Well Quick

"Just after her third birthday, my little daughter, Connie, had a serious attack of intestinal flu," says Mrs. H. W. Turnage, 217 Cadwalder St., San Antonio, Texas. "It left her very weak and pale. Her bowels wouldn't act right, she had no appetite and nothing agreed with her.

"Our physician told us to give her some California Fig Syrup. It made her pick up right away, and now she is as robust and happy as any child in our neighborhood. I give California Fig Syrup full credit for her wonderful condition. It is a great thing for children."

Children like the rich, fruity taste of California Fig Syrup, and you can give it to them as often as they need it, because it is purely vegetable. For over 50 years leading physicians have recommended it, and its overwhelming sales record of over four million bottles a year shows it gives satisfaction. Nothing compares with it as a gentle but certain laxative, and it goes further than this. It regulates the stomach and bowels and gives tone and strength to these organs so they continue to act normally, of their own accord.

There are many imitations of California Fig Syrup, so look for the name "California" on the carton to be sure you get the genuine.

Improve the taste of milk this way—and your children will drink more of it . . . .

SAYS one of America's leading physicians: "Two tablespoonfuls of Karo in a glass of milk not only improves the taste of the milk but doubles its food value."

This doctor's advice is valuable—for he knows children and he knows Karo.

"Serve plenty of Karo to the kiddies—especially underweight children, in milk, on cereals, on sliced bread. Watch their weight increase!"

And—do you know why Karo is so splendid for children? Because each ounce of Karo contains 120 calories—the energy-giving value of Karo is nearly twice that of eggs and lean beef, weight for weight.

What is good for children is also good for the entire family.

Of interest to every car owner:

A statement of General Motors' Policy

by Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., President

THE public has been visiting the automobile shows in the larger cities of the country to see new models.

Suppose you could drop a curtain over the 1929 automobile shows and raise it immediately upon the shows of ten years ago. How vividly the changes would then appear!

Go back five years, or even three, and the contrasts are amazing. So fast have the improvements followed one another that every year has offered you more for your automobile dollar—in performance, in comfort, in safety, in beauty and in style. Never was this fact quite so impressive as in the cars now on display.

This is real progress, and inevitably General Motors has been a leader in it. You cannot have hundreds of engineers, in one organization, thinking and working day and night without knowing more about making automobiles than was known the year before. You cannot have great Research Laboratories, the Proving Ground and the unmatched resources and skill of Fisher body without developing constantly better processes and new ideas. The patronage of the public makes possible all this machinery of betterment; so the public is entitled to each improvement as promptly as it has been proved.

In this way came the self-starter, the closed body, durable Duco finish, four wheel brakes. By the same process one of the remarkable feats in industrial history has just been effected: Chevrolet has been transformed into a six-cylinder car within the price range of the four—almost overnight. Similarly, the new brakes and transmissions of Cadillac and LaSalle are a fundamental improvement; while the new models of Buick, Oldsmobile, Oakland and Pontiac all represent values that could not have been offered before.

Such progress, born of the inherent ambition of an organization of active minds to do better and to give more, is of benefit to all. It offers you more for your money with each succeeding year. It gives you more value for your present car when you trade it in.

This is our policy. This is real progress.

WASHDAYS are now WASH-HOURS on the FARM

THE many advantages that a Maytag has over other washers are advantages that are available to any farm home because the Maytag gives you your choice of power—gasoline or electricity.

The Maytag does the average farm washing in an hour or two and what farm wife would not appreciate the economy of the life-lasting cast-aluminum tub; the saving in clothes by the gentle water washing action of the gyratator; the saving in time and labor effected by the new Roller Water Remover that wrings everything evenly dry and spares the buttons?

Only the Maytag has the Gasoline Multi-Motor

This modern, high-grade engine is made for the Maytag by The Maytag Company—the world's largest producers of single-cylinder gasoline engines. It is a simple, sturdy, smooth-running, reliable power plant. A thrust of the pedal starts it. It is so compact that it is interchangeable with the electric motor by removing only four bolts.

BOY SCOUT HEROES GIVE THEIR LIVES FOR OTHERS

Families Awarded Gold Medals for Youths Who Made the Supreme Sacrifice.

New York.—In attempting rescues of drowning persons three Boy Scout heroes made the supreme sacrifice, it was announced at the national offices of the Boy Scouts of America in New York, through the Boy Scout national court of honor, of which Daniel Carter Beard is chairman.

The three scout heroes whose lives were lost were Guy Atwood Ruggles of Tecumseh, Okla.; Curtis Larsen of Warren, Pa., and Charles McKnett of Huntington Park, Calif.

Awards of gold honor medals to the parents of these three boys and to seven other scouts who endangered their lives in making rescues, were made by the national court of honor. Certificates of heroism also were issued to many scouts whose scout training made it possible to save the lives of others without grave danger to themselves.

Scout Ruggles was drowned June 16, 1928, in rescuing Miss Jewell Caler of Lindsay, Okla., from a treacherous stream near David, Okla. Ruggles, a life scout, twenty-one years old, became exhausted and sank after getting Miss Caler to shallow water.

Sacrificing his own life in a successful effort to save his younger sister, Scout Curtis Maxwell Larsen, thirteen, of Troop No. 4, Warren, Pa., was drowned in the Alleghany river at Big Bend on July 16, 1927. The scout was rowing a boat in which were also two of his sisters. The younger fell overboard. Scout Larsen, an inexperienced swimmer, nevertheless dove into the water and brought his sister to the boat. He sank and drowned.

Scout Charles Edward McKnett, twelve, of Troop No. 17, Huntington Park, Calif., attempted to rescue his younger brother, Robert, nine, from a deep pool below the falls of Fish canyon in the San Bernardino mountains on June 3, 1928. The McKnett family, consisting of the father and mother and three boys, were on a picnic at Fish Canyon. One of the boys, Robert, plunged into the pool and Charles and a younger brother arrived. Robert was seized with cramps and sank. Charles directed a still younger brother to run for help and leaped in. He could not break the drowning grip of his brother and was pulled to the bottom.

Turkish Women Slow to Adopt Short Skirts

Constantinople.—Turkish women are not adopting the new regulations in respect to short skirts and bobbed hair as readily as was expected. Although many a close-fitting little cloche hat and many a pair of silk stockings are seen on the streets of Constantinople, the more conservative women, both here and in the smaller towns, are resisting the innovations stubbornly.

Recently Kiazim Pasha, the president of the Angora assembly, felt the necessity of issuing a series of sharp rebukes to his countrywomen.

"To let bobbed hair grow out again," is a retrograde step, a backward movement from the way of progress. Long ago men got rid of their long locks; it is now women's turn to do the same."

The same applied to short skirts, he further stated.

"No woman today can sweep the streets with long skirts without being ridiculous. They are in no way fitted to the structure of the feminine body and I see no reason to hide the legs in a full and shapeless bundle."

Silk head scarfs also came in for their shade of criticism. The pasha announced firmly that western hats were far more becoming. Scarfs were like ugly nightcaps, he asserted.

The Pig, Not the Cat, Came Back This Time

Brentwood, N. H.—The cat comes back, but so does the pig. Not long ago Ray Pike sold a young pig to a man who lives two miles away. The pig was put in a bag and carried to his new home, which was a perfectly good one, but the little pig was not contented. He got out of his pen, traveled about a bit and two in days was back in his old pen. He showed all sorts of affection when he saw his mother, and she was just about as glad to see him, which is not always the case when pigs are separated for even a short time.

Work, play, rest and sleep in moderation.

BUILDERS GO BACK TO THATCHED ROOF

There has been a return to the thatched roof in England, largely due to the influence of a few architects who have educated their clients into the esthetic value of this sort of covering for a house. This has led to a start of the practice in this country, where several very substantial houses have been built with roofs of thatch. In these instances the thatch and the thatchers were brought from England, as no really accomplished thatchers could be found here.

It is a complicated art. The town of Salhouse in Norfolk, England, is the center of the industry. There is a family of thatchers there which has been identified with the industry since the early part of the Sixteenth century.

It is no easy job and in order to become really expert the workman must spend an apprenticeship of nine years. The difficulty is in negotiating the gables, angles, domes and minarets which are to be encountered in covering a house. The workmen use a needle nearly three feet long in sewing the thick roof.—New Haven Register.

Tactful Rebuke That Princess Had Earned

The Duchess Elise Torlonia, who has renounced her title in order to recover her American citizenship, said at a dinner party in New Haven:

"People who have titles know their value. There's a story about the queen of England that I like.

"There had been a garden party or something at Buckingham palace, and when it was finished one of the court officials said to Princess Mary, who was then only a child:

"'Well, little lady, so it's all over.'

"But the princess ran to the queen and said:

"'He oughtn't to speak to me like that. Little lady indeed! I'm a princess.'

"'Yes,' said the queen, 'you're a princess now. I hope you may be a lady by and by. Go back and tell Sir John I said so.'"

Lengthy Fingernails

One of the famous Paris firms of the Rue de la Paix, which is known around the world for the antiques and curiosities it sells, recently received an offer from China of the longest fingernails in history. The Chinese correspondent wrote that the two nails of the last two fingers of his left hand have attained a length of seventy-four centimeters (fifty-two and a third inches) and he desires to dispose of them now at a profit. He hopes to sell them for $300 and suggests that perhaps some American museum would be interested in them.

The Interruption

Ruth Elder, the daring airwoman, is the heroine of a little story.

It was at a dinner party in Birmingham, and an aged anti-feminist banker was laying down the law about woman's place.

"Woman's place is the home," he said. "That is all she's fit for. Women have never produced a Shakespeare or a Homer, an Edison or Ford, a Raphael or Michelangelo or Lincoln or—"

But here Miss Elder interrupted.

"Dear me!" she said. "I thought women produced them all."

The Worst Yet

Sacha Guitry, the French playwright and actor, hates the movies, and on his American visit he said one day to a critic in New York:

"The movies have done the legitimate drama a lot of harm, but last night I heard the worst thing yet."

"Yes?" said the critic.

"Yes," said M. Guitry. "I met at a supper party last night a movie star who kept calling the drama the speakies."

Roman Relics in England

Remarkable Roman relics are being revealed on Prysg field, Caerleon, near Newport, England, where the most important Roman fortress site in Britain is situated. Great walls, ramparts, look-out turrets, a massive stone water tank, centurions' quarters, and even those of the legion commander are now visible. A quantity of bronze sword trappings, pottery, catapults, and sling stones have been recovered.

The Hardy Old-Timer

About the time the hardy old-timer gets pretty well started on the hard winters he put in when a boy, he begins to sneeze, and one of his daughters, wearing 13 ounces of silk, has to telephone the janitor for more heat.—Kansas City Star.

Rather Cool

"The cold in the White sea was so intense that we couldn't stroke our dogs."

"Why not?"

"Their tails were frozen so stiff that they broke off if they wagged them."—Der Wahre Jakob, Berlin.

DAIRY FACTS

PREVENT LOSS BY CLEAN HANDLING

Souring Is Caused by Bacteria After Milking.

Clean production, prompt cooling and frequent deliveries will prevent the souring of milk and will put dollars in the pockets of dairy farmers.

"This souring is caused by bacteria which get into the milk after it is drawn from the cow and can only be prevented by the most careful handling," says John A. Arey, extension dairyman at North Carolina State college.

When first drawn from the cow, milk contains very few if any of the bacteria and the contamination comes from outside sources. Chief among these are the cow's body, the hands of the person doing the milking, the air and the containers.

Mr. Arey states that all of the sources can be eliminated by seeing that the cow's flanks and udder are thoroughly cleaned before milking, that the milker's hands are clean, and that all vessels or containers have been cleaned and sterilized.

These containers should first be rinsed in lukewarm water and then scrubbed with a heavy brush in water to which has been added a strong alkali solution. They should then be sterilized with live steam or some chemical made for that purpose. All utensils in which the seams are not well flushed with solder should be avoided as these crevices are hard to clean and furnish a harboring place for bacteria.

The milk should be cooled as soon as possible after milking, placed in the containers in which it is to be delivered and stored in a refrigerator or cooling tank. Only by taking these precautions can the dairyman prevent the milk from souring and be sure of delivering pure, sweet milk to the market, states Mr. Arey.

Give Dairy Cows Silage With Their Winter Feed

Corn silage is the best and most economical way of providing cattle with the succulence necessary in dairy feeding, says the New York State College of Agriculture at Ithaca, New York. Some way must be provided to carry pasture conditions over into winter feeding and silage is the best form of succulence to be provided.

Good legume hay with a succulent feed furnishes a combination of protein, minerals, and succulence which comes as near as possible to pasture conditions. This palatable and bulky feed is good for the digestive tract, and is economical as a source of carbohydrates. Corn silage stimulates the appetites of the animals so that they do not easily go off feed; they consume larger amounts of roughage than when fed on hay alone.

The ribbon-like road wandered through the wood;
The motor was humming beneath the hood.
She laughed as we flew through the evening air
That played hide and seek in her golden hair.

I knew that her love was all mine and true;
I read the old tale in her eyes so blue.
She nestled up close as we sped along—
I sang in the twilight an old love song.

I parked in the dark by an old oak tree
Alone with my daughter, just half past three.
The reason we parked—there's no secret in that—
I felt the bump bump of a tire gone flat.

Health and Home

FOOD FOR CHILDREN WHO TRAVEL

Many times, and especially during the summer months, mothers are forced to take their children on trips with them. During these trips, the parent is forced to contend with that ever-present and serious problem of food for the child.

As in almost every other case, the chief source of worry, during these periods, is the milk supply, its source, its purity and its food value. It is not always convenient to get market milk of dependable quality for, in many sections of the country, adequate facilities for its care are not provided. To meet the needs of mothers in these trying situations, science has provided a form of milk, conveniently carried and easily prepared. The cans are in two sizes, the one containing six ounces and the other sixteen.

Evaporated milk is just pure cows' milk with more than half of the water removed. None of its food value is lessened; in fact its digestibility is improved. It is easily mixed with water and is, undoubtedly, the most practical form of milk for use as a food for children. Some of the country's leading pediatricians recommend its use, employing the following formula:

From Sixth Week to Third Month.

Milk, evaporated	6 ounces
Lime water	3 ounces
Milk sugar	2 ounces
Boiled water	26 ounces

Seven feedings in twenty-four hours; 4 to 5 ounces at three-hour intervals during the day and four-hour intervals at night.

From Third Month to Fifth Month.

Milk, evaporated	7½ ounces
Lime water	3 ounces
Milk sugar	2 ounces
Boiled water	29½ ounces

Six feedings in twenty-four hours; 5 to 6 ounces at three-hour intervals during the day and a feeding at 10 p. m.

From Fifth to Seventh Month.

Milk evaporated	10 ounces
Lime water	3 ounces
Milk sugar	2 ounces
Boiled water	29 ounces

Five feedings in twenty-four hours; 6 to 7 ounces at four-hour intervals, the last feeding to be given at 10 p. m.

From Seventh to Ninth Month.

Why Bodies Were Embalmed.

In ancient Egypt bodies were embalmed because it was believed that they would some day be restored to life.

Why "Capital" Punishment.

Hanging is called "capital" punishment from the Latin, caput, the head. Beheading was once the usual death penalty.

WHY

Silver Quarter Is Called "Two Bits."

"Bit" has been applied in England to coins for centuries. It was one time thieves' slang for money in general. Thomas Dekker so used the term in "A Knight's Conjuring: Jests to Make You Merie," which was first printed in 1607. Later "bit" came to be applied to any small silver coin. Even yet the British use it in such phrases as "sixpenny bit." Our use of the term in "two bits," meaning a quarter of a dollar, originated in the West Indies, especially Jamaica, where "bit" was originally applied to small silver coins forming fractions of the Spanish dollar. It was applied specifically to the real, which was equal to one-eighth of the dollar then in use. Examples of the term in that sense date back to the Seventeenth century. When the Spanish dollar disappeared from circulation in the United States, a quarter was called two bits, and a half dollar four bits. Twelve cents and a half is never called a bit, although in some sections of the country fifteen cents is called a long bit, and ten cents is a short bit.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Why Sleeping in Open Promotes Good Health

Contrary to old-fashioned ideas sleeping in the open is not harmful and night air is now held to be invigorating. When the sun sets and night falls night air is the only kind obtainable and it is considered far better have plenty of night air than to breathe foul or stale air. Night air acts as a tonic, says Dr. Harvey Wiley, authority on health. One of the sins of civilization, he claims, is the invention of the house. If there were no houses there would be no tuberculosis, he asserts. Tuberculosis, however, is not the only disease the house is responsible for. Cutting off the proper supply of fresh air reduces the vitality of the body to such an extent that not only tuberculosis germs, but germs of other infectious diseases may more rapidly take hold. This problem can be best handled, he says, by making use of sleeping porches. Every house, whether in the crowded city or in the country, has one or more porches. These porches can easily and should be fitted out as sleeping porches.

Why Variation in Wind.

The weather bureau says that owing to the friction at the surface of the earth, the air near the ground always has less velocity than the air a few hundred feet above it. In the daytime this faster air is mixed up with the surface air by convection induced by surface heating. In this way the surface air is given a greater velocity than it would have if not mixed with the upper and faster wind. At night, when there is no surface heating and no convection, the upper wind, except when quite strong, glides over the lower air, which is held relatively quiet by surface friction. When the upper winds are very strong they mix with the lower air by mechanical turbulence and the surface wind remains as strong by night as by day.

Why Anomaly of Frost.

Frost forms only when the temperature of the object on which it occurs, and the immediately adjacent air, is at or below the freezing point, 32 degrees Fahrenheit. The temperature of the grass, for instance, especially in low spots and on still, clear nights, may be 32 degrees Fahrenheit, or lower, while that of the air a little distance away, and 20 to 30 feet higher, may be 40 degrees Fahrenheit, or over. This explains the anomaly of frost at 40 degrees Fahrenheit. It was 40 degrees Fahrenheit, say, where the thermometer was, but not where the frost was.

Why We Say "Piping Hot."

"Piping hot" is a relic of the ancient custom of a baker blowing his pipe in the village street as a signal to his customers that his bread was at that moment hot from the oven. The baker was evidently an unpopular member of the community in those far-off days, for in the minds of those of a superstitious nature he was synonymous with the devil! So we get the term "baker's dozen." The devil's dozen—13—was the number of witches supposed to gather in evil conclave at set periods, and the spiteful minds of the ill-willed readily substituted "baker" for "devil."

Why Mirage Forms.

A mirage is due to conditions existing in the atmosphere. As a result of deviation of the rays of light caused by refraction and reflection, objects seen with the eye appear in unusual positions and often multiple or are inverted. One cause of a mirage in the desert is the diminution of the density of the air near the surface of the earth, often produced by the radiation of heat, the denser stratum being thus placed above instead of, as is usually the case, below the rarer

MENDOZA HEADS GANG OF MEXICAN BANDITS

Displaces "El Catorce" in Front Page Honors.

Mexico City.—Benjamin Mendoza, a bandit who sometimes operates almost on the borders of the capital, is seizing the front page honors formerly held by the famous "El Catorce." The bandits or rebels who recently fought with federals on the Cuernavaca-Mexico City highway almost within sight of an automobile containing United States Ambassador Dwight W. Morrow and Mrs. Morrow, were said to have been members of the Mendoza group.

Mendoza with Maximilliano Vigueras is regarded as responsible for most of the recent holdups of motorists on the highways around the capital. In at least one of his attacks Mendoza exhibited a savagery which is generally rare among the bandit gentry in Mexico.

Assault Victims.

This was the holdup and assault of a dozen or more automobile loads of Sunday week-enders on a visit to the famous cave near Cuernavaca. Besides being deprived of their money and valuables, several women of the tourists' party were assaulted brutally by Mendoza's men. The bandits, using the tourists' car, also fired on a nearby village.

Facts of the holdup, including the details of the assault on the women, were slow in reaching the capital.

Mendoza's attacks on villages and towns in the region around Cuernavaca where he generally operates have on one or two occasions been extraordinarily relentless. At one point where he wiped out a small federal garrison, his men came away with fifty federal uniforms, according to a foreigner who was in the district at the time.

Turn Loose Locomotives.

With himself and a picked band wearing the uniforms, Mendoza and fifty men entered another town in the guise of federals and asked for local volunteers to help hunt Mendoza. Twenty-seven citizens responded. They were barely outside the town, according to the story brought to the capital, when the bandits turned on the volunteers and killed them without warning.

Twice the Mendoza band, or a group believed to have been under his direction, set loose wild locomotives on the Cuernavaca-Mexico City railway in an attempt to wreck passenger trains. Each time, fortunately, the locomotive wrecked itself.

Within the last few weeks a federal escort of twenty-five men on a Cuernavaca train was completely wiped out by bandits, and the train burned. There were almost no passengers aboard and the dead were confined to the soldiery.

Plane Successfully Used in Seeding Grass

Portland, Ore.—Success of grass seeding experiments carried on by airplane over a 1,000-acre area in Coos county, Oregon, may result in the seeding of large pasture areas along the Pacific coast from the air in 1929.

An excellent stand of grass, evenly distributed over the area, was obtained at approximately one-third of the expense incurred by hand seeding. Harold R. Adams and N. W. Perkins, commercial flyers at Lyrtle Point, set a record for speed in seeding grass lands when they covered the 1,000 acres in slightly more than ten hours.

The idea, which was conceived by Dr. Earl G. Lowe, a physician at Coquille, Ore., and one of the stockholders in the Coquille Valley Sheep and Wool company, may be extended to other pasture lands next year.

Using a specially constructed hopper to hold the seed in front of the cockpit, the valve opening of which was controlled by the pilot in the rear cockpit, the pilot was able to seed strips 90 feet wide flying 70 miles an hour from an altitude of 500 feet.

Communist Girls Adopt Signet Wedding Ring

Moscow.—Communist girls, longing for something more than a two-minute marriage registration ceremony to become the lawful wives of the men they love, have invented a "red" signet wedding ring for husband and wife to wear. It is to be a symbol of marriage. The ring is a plain band of gray iron. The seal is the Soviet emblem of a crossed hammer and sickle with the addition of an engraved portrait of Lenine in the center.

Violent opposition to the ring, and wedding rings of all kinds, has arisen. The subject is being debated in Comsomol (young communist) meetings. Opponents declare that wedding rings are petty bourgeois ornaments, a symbol of slavery and barbarism.

PIG CROP DEPENDS ON CARE OF BROOD SOWS

Size and quality of the pig crop next fall will depend in large measure upon the care and feed given brood sows this winter, says H. G. Zavoral, a livestock specialist of the agricultural extension service of the University of Minnesota.

Home grown feeds are usually the most economical and should furnish the basis of the ration, he says. Variety adds to palatability and usually supplies more of the necessary nutrients. Too high a percentage of corn or barley and too low a percentage of protein feeds are common errors in feeding. The following rations have given satisfactory results in wintering brood sows:

1. 50 parts of whole or ground oats; 40 parts ear corn; skimmilk or 10 per cent tankage; alfalfa hay.
2. 50 parts ground barley; 50 parts ground oats; skimmilk; alfalfa hay.
3. 30 parts ear corn; 30 parts ground barley; 30 parts ground oats; 10 parts protein supplement of 50 parts tankage; 25 parts oilmeal; 25 parts ground alfalfa hay.
4. 33 parts corn; 33 parts oats; 33 parts shorts or middlings; alfalfa hay; skimmilk or tankage.

The amount of feed depends on the condition of the animals. Two pounds of grain for every 100 pounds of pig is usually sufficient. Young gilts require more feed than mature sows because they are still growing. Other feeds may be given dry or in slop. Enough hot water should be added to take the chill off the slop during winter months.

Skimmilk, good quality alfalfa hay, or clover hay should be fed to furnish protein. A god protein suppement is composed of 50 parts tankage, 25 parts of oilmeal and 25 parts of ground alfalfa hay. Brood sows should have access at all times to a mineral mixture, and the following has given satisfactory results: Fifty parts limestone of high calcium content, 28 parts of bonemeal, 20 parts salt, 2 parts iron oxide, .01 part copper sulphate, and .02 parts potassium iodide.

Exercise for brood sows should not be overlooked. Feeding them some distance from the sleeping quarters will help to provide it.

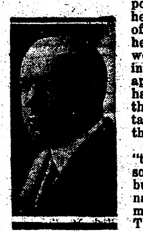
A teacher explaining to her class that "ous" at the end of many words meant "full of," gave as example: "Joyous," meaning full of joy; "vigorous," meaning full of vigor. Now give me some more examples of words ending in "ous," meaning "full of."

"Pious," said Tommy.—Christian Science Monitor.

YOUNG MEN AND WOMEN WHO THINK CLEARLY THE GREATEST DEMAND OF AMERICAN BUSINESS

Bankers Association President Gives the Five Essentials of Sound Thinking in Business—Greater Opportunity Than Ever Before for Young People With Educational Training and Power to Analyze Problems.

By CRAIG B. HAZLEWOOD
President American Bankers Association



CRAIG B. HAZLEWOOD

ONLY half a century ago Michael Pupin, a shepherd boy, guarded his flocks by night among the fields of Serbia. Thieves often lurked in the bordering cornfields awaiting an opportunity to make off with a part of the herd. Serbian boys were taught a method of signalling one another for warning and help. Each carried a knife with a long wooden handle which he would thrust deep into the ground and in case cattle thieves approached he would strike the wooden handle. The sound would be transmitted through the ground to other boys some distance away who could hear and interpret the message.

"Why is it," Pupin asked his mother, "that we can signal this way? Why is it the sound can be heard through the ground, but not through the air? Why is it the signals can be heard in the pasture land so much better than in the plowed fields?" The boy's mother could not answer his questions, nor could the village teacher. However, having an eager mind and great determination, th boy decided to go to America, where he might win an education and find out the answers to these and other perplexing questions. Hundreds of other boys under the same circumstances and with the same set of conditions merely accepted these things without once questioning them just because they had always done them that way.

The Land of Education and Success

So a penniless immigrant boy from Serbia at the age of fifteen landed in New York in 1874 and, years later, having worked his way through Columbia University, concentrated the wonder and simplicity of his mind upon the problem of sound, which had puzzled him as a shepherd boy. The results of his thinking—what he has accomplished for the long distance telephone and for radio communication by his inventions—are known the world over. "If during the past twenty-two years this company had been compelled to do without one invention of Michael Pupin," an official of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company once said, "and yet give the same service it is giving today it would have had to spend at least $100,000,000 more than it has expended."

These inventions, in which millions of dollars of capital have been invested, were the result of the thinking of a mere country lad who had the simplicity to wonder, the determination to know and the power to apply what he learned.

Stimulating the imagination and thinking is the greatest purpose of education. What American business needs more than anything else is young men and women to think—individuals who are not mentally anchored to tradition, who do not merely appropriate other people's ideas, but who are hard, purposeful thinkers, independent and unprejudiced, with the ability to concentrate and strike straight for the heart of a problem.

Business Needs Folk Who Think

America has astounded the world by its readiness in casting aside traditional viewpoints, disregarding traditional difficulties and pioneering new shortcut formulas in the realm of business. Business is undergoing epochal changes.

Business problems are crowding in upon us so rapidly that the executive knows not where to look for adequate help or relief. With the enormous increase in size and intricacy of business affairs the problems have become so complicated and the mass of information necessary to their solution so great that the "days are not long enough." The demand for managerial and executive ability is rushing ahead—the opportunity for young men and women who have the professional training and who develop genuine thinking power is greater than ever.

All business feels the same crying need for the men who see clearly and think conclusively. Wherever we look—manufacturing, wholesaling, retailing, banking, financing—new forces are at work. Vast movements are under way and executives are seeking light upon perplexing problems daily.

Let us consider briefly the five essentials of a sound thinker. If I were looking for a young man of exceptional promise I should hope, first, to find in him the simplicity to wonder. Every great advancement in business has been made by men who dared to wonder, who had the courage to inquire into present procedure and who had the audacity to ask whether something that had been done a certain way for a long time might not be wrong. Although the history of America's progress from its very discovery to the present time has shown the value of an inquiring mind, there is still an inevitable tendency in most men to accept in a docile manner the opinions, methods, supposed facts, procedures and processes of the past. With due reverence to the effort, the spirit, the accomplishments of the past, let us make it our rule that everything be looked at with the clear questioning mind of the scientist.

Business Requires an Open Mind

Second, among the essentials for sound thinking I would write down an open mind. We have mentioned freeing our minds from the influence of tradition. Let us think also without prejudice of personal feelings, desires or consequence. Let us seek only the truth. Mere surface reasoning must be discounted. Old "can'ts" and "don'ts" must be thrown into the discard. A man who has an open mind will do a great many things because he doesn't know they can't be done.

The third essential to sound thinking is knowledge—a thorough, comprehensive understanding of all the factors involved in a problem. It has been said that most problems answer themselves when the facts have been gathered. A well known student and teacher of business describes the method of attacking a problem as tearing it down, reassembling the problem and drawing the conclusion. There can be nothing but guess work or intuition unless the unknown quantities are discovered.

As a fourth essential, sound thinking requires the capacity to generalize. How often we have seen men sweating and confused before a mass of details which they were utterly unable to classify and crystallise. We have the problem of sorting out the relevant, attaining a perspective and reaching a conclusion that can be defended against any attack. To certain minds this procedure comes naturally; to others training in the solution of complicated problems points the way out.

The Time for Action

Fifth among the essentials of sound thinking is the power to apply. A few individuals have minds that travel at random or in circles. Some have minds that even refuse to budge. But there are still others who naturally or through training have minds that can be directed straight through to the practical application of their thoughts. They refuse to compromise or to be thwarted in purpose before definite application of their ideas has been achieved.

It is possible, I believe, for young people to train themselves to an inquisitive attitude, an open mind and the ability to classify and interpret material step by step from the beginning of a problem to its final solution and application. Here, then, is the thought I would leave—the paramount need of business is sound thinking. Some may think I have overstated the case, have set too high a standard. They may feel that they are merely cogs in a machine. That, too, is a part of the problem. The only way to solve that is to find time and place in the day's work for thinking.

SCHOOL SAVINGS BANKING MOVEMENT REACHES IMPRESSIVE PROPORTIONS

Almost 14,000 of America's schools now have school savings banking plans in operation, and about four million pupils are learning systematic savings through this type of thrift, with deposits in excess of $26,000,000, recent reports of the American Bankers Association's Savings Bank Division show. The schools included in the reports are attended by 4,609,82 pupils, of whom 3,980,237 are participants in the school savings banking plans as depositors. During the year these pupils received interest in the amount of $947,610 on their deposits.

The reports gathered by the association also show that there are 38 cities in the United States in which a full 100 per cent of the grammar school enrollment is participating in school savings banking. The figures covering high schools show that in 4 cities 100 per cent of the attendance in this class are school savers.

DAIRY FACTS

EXPERIMENTS IN CATTLE FEEDING

Need Mineral Supplements With Poor Roughage.

When poor roughage is fed to dairy cows mineral supplements are shown to be necessary in a recent publication of the Wisconsin experiment station. Three cows fed on timothy hay, corn silage and a grain mixture were poor producers of milk. In addition they were slow to breed and when bred they tended to dry up from six weeks to two months earlier than three cows fed on alfalfa hay.

Another test on minerals showed that cows producing from 50 to 60 pounds of milk daily without direct exposure to sunlight were unable to maintain a calcium balance in their bodies even though the ration was otherwise adequate. When the cows were exposed to sunlight for six hours daily they decreased the loss of calcium from their bodies by 25 per cent.

In a comparison of soy bean hay versus alfalfa hay the cows produced approximately the same amount of butterfat and milk but the cows on soy bean hay gained only half as much body weight and wasted more of their hay. The results of this test, which does not check with tests run at some other stations, shows that soy bean hay was calculated to be worth 73 per cent as much as alfalfa hay.

In this connection it is interesting to note some experiments that were conducted in chopping alfalfa and soy bean hay. No advantage was gained in chopping alfalfa, but the cows wasted less of the soy bean hay. This caused the chopping to improve the value of soy bean hay by 28 per cent. These figures indicate that it may prove profitable to chop soy bean hay when used for feeding dairy cattle.

Modern Dairy Barn Must Have Good Ventilation

It must not be forgotten that each cow in the stable actually gives off from her breath alone about ten pounds of carbondioxide per day and over two gallons of water. Hence, it is perfectly obvious that in the modern dairy stable there must be some system whereby this used, moist, foul air may be regularly taken out of the stable and replaced by fresh air. During the winter months, the occasional opening of doors and windows will help but how often is this done during winter months, and needless to say it is never done during the night.

King and other authorities on stable ventilation have estimated that there should be a continual air flow through the stable at the rate of about 3,600 cubic feet per cow per hour. In other words, in a cow stable 36 feet by 50 feet with an 8-foot ceiling, there should be a sufficient flow of air so that one-quarter of the air would be replaced every hour or that the air be completely changed in the stable six times per day. If this were done by the opening of doors and windows, the resulting changes of temperatures, chills to the animals, etc., would obviously be courting disaster. Hence, a regular system whereby such a change of air will go on continuously and still allow the maintenance of uniform heat conditions, should be the ambition of every one installing a ventilation system.

Well Bred Calves Most Valuable Dairy Asset

Calves from low producing stock are worth little more than their value for veal, but those from high producing strains must be assigned much greater valuation, as they command excellent prices as breeding stock.

In the keeping of high producing animals there are, of course, added expenses such as increased depreciation and risk, increased labor in caring for the animals, and expenses of advertising and selling; but it will generally be found that the value of the calves produced from such stock will more than offset the added expense of raising them over and above that involved in the keeping of common stock.

Cold Hampers Cow

A high producing dairy cow cannot continue normal production if she is exposed to severe weather. It is, therefore, important if good yields are expected to hold up through the cold months, that all discomforts be eliminated. A comfortable cow will more than repay for added labor for her protection. Milk is 87 per cent water, and a large part of this gets into the animal's system from the water trough.

Quarters for Cows

In addition to proper feeding, dairy cows will need good quarters if they are to produce maximum returns for their owners. Dairy cows do not have long hair or surplus fat to protect them from cold weather. They are more sensitive to cold winds, drafts and poor quarters than any other kind of farm live stock, unless it is the poultry. Warmth, comfort, ventilation and sanitation should receive consideration in fixing up the dairy barns or sheds for the winter months.

Prevent Spread of Hog Cholera

Infection May Be Carried From Contaminated Places to Clean Yards.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

It is positively known that the infection of hog cholera may be carried from contaminated sources to clean premises, from the sick herd to the healthy one. Though some of the means of conveying the disease are still obscure, there are several well-known channels of infection. Against these the swine owners may readily guard in protecting their herds.

The most dangerous factor in the spread of this disease, say veterinary specialists of the United States Department of Agriculture, is the contact of hogs sick with cholera with susceptible hogs, that is, hogs that have not been immunized. Sick hogs should be kept apart from the remainder of the herd and should be well fenced in, thus eliminating the danger of their escaping and mingling with healthy though susceptible hogs. On the other hand farmers should keep all hogs protected against roaming hogs by having hog-tight fences.

Ways Infection Spreads.

The introduction into the herd of new stock hogs coming from either small local stockyards or from local sales has carried cholera to entire herds in many instances. These small assembling and loading yards become contaminated with cholera and the disease, as a rule, goes with the hogs purchased there. There is the same danger in buying hogs at public sale, as well as in borrowing for breeding purposes and in returning hogs from fairs or other exhibitions. Unless the home herd carries immunity against cholera, new stock hogs brought to the farm should be kept by themselves well removed from the others for at least 21 days. The lending and borrowing of breeding stock should be done with great precaution to avoid the spread of cholera.

The failure of swine owners to burn or bury the hogs that die on their premises has resulted in many an outbreak of hog cholera. This is the factor that enables the dog and the buzzard to carry cholera infection to other farms. All diseased animals that die on the farm should be properly disposed of by either burning or burying deeply.

The feeding of table scraps and garbage to nonimmune hogs is a dangerous practice from the standpoint of cholera infection. Such feed may contain trimmings, rind and bones originating from cholera-infected pork, and the virus of the disease may be conveyed to the herd.

The stock-food peddler and the hog buyer going from farm to farm, and from one hog lot or pen to another, are still regarded as potential factors in the carrying of cholera infection. These men go to many places in the course of the day and may tramp through infected premises. There is always a possibility that the virus of cholera may be carried in the mud or manure on shoes, hoofs of horses, and wheels of wagons.

Small streams, brooks and canals, in which cholera-sick hogs wallow become contaminated and the infection carried by the current may attack susceptible hogs having access to these waters. Hogs not immunized should be kept away from such streams.

While other possible means of transmission may be enumerated, those mentioned are considered the chief ones. If these factors are guarded against, much will be done to prevent the spread of cholera and to reduce losses. However, since it is a difficult matter to safeguard against all these dangers, the safe and positive method to follow in sections producing many hogs is that of immunization of the herd. This done as yearly procedure will remove all anxiety as to the safety of the animals. It should not be forgotten, however, that sanitation in the raising of swine has much to do with the health and thriftiness of the herd.

Food for Birds Kept in Natural Storage

An English ornithologist found his way into the heart of the Ural mountains in the valley of the Petchora river, a writer in the Chicago Journal relates. Along the lower part of the river stretched the tundra, a dreary, uninhabited treeless swamp, covered with ice and snow. Nevertheless, he found that this unattractive spot was the summer home of almost half the bird population of the Old world.

The traveler reached the region in early April. Forests and tundra were as devoid of life as the desert of Sahara; but a change was near. Suddenly summer broke over the scene. Innumerable birds of all sizes and colors appeared within 48 hours.

The birds would starve if it were not for one thing. The perpetual sun of the Arctic summers causes plants to bear in wonderful profusion. Each year, when the berries are ripe and before the birds can gather many of them, the snow descends upon the tundra; it covers the crop and preserves it in perfect condition. Then comes the spring sun to melt the snow and uncover the bushes, loaded with ripened fruit, and the ground beneath covered with the fallen provender. The berries never decay beneath the snow.

Gems of Every Kind Appealed to Beecher

"Sermons in stones" is not merely a pretty phrase. More than one minister has preached from such a text. Henry Ward Beecher seldom mounted the pulpit without a few of these lovely precious stones in his pocket, or, indeed, went anywhere without them, and he frequently referred to them in his sermons.

He was trying to make a collection, but that dear man had no more chance of making a collection than snow has of piling high on the Atlantic. Possessions melted away in the fervent glow of his benevolence. He would ask my opinion of a stone, become passionately attached to it, buy it.

"This," he would say determinedly, "is for my collection. This time I'm really going to start."

A few days later I would see him showing it proudly to a friend. The friend admired it copiously.

"You like it?" Beecher would say, beaming. Then he came closer, pressed it into his friend's hand. "Here, take it; it's yours. Perhaps you haven't any gems yet. I have plenty—a whole collection."

Then he would catch my eye and edge away shamefacedly.

"You know that may mean the beginning of a collection for that chap," he would say defensively.

I recall his telling me of the peculiar and powerful effect which gems had upon him, epitomizing as they did for him the greatness of the Creator in giving us these little treasures of supreme beauty.—Dr. George F. Kunz in the Saturday Evening Post.

And It Would Always Be "Just Like Home"

"Now, my dear," said the young wife, "don't let us quarrel like so many other couples. You know all we have to do is to avoid the first quarrel and then there never can be any."

"Of course," the young husband agreed, "but you stubbornly persist in boarding at a hotel, although you know I can't endure hotel life and want a home of my own."

"We differ on that subject, to be sure; but that is a small matter. Why not compromise?"

"Certainly, if you can suggest a way."

"Nothing is easier. We will board at a hotel, and every evening when you come home I'll complain about the hotel help, just as if they were our own, and no doubt the proprietor will agree to let me discharge one or two occasionally and you can spend the morning at the intelligence offices hunting for new ones, just as if we were keeping house, you know."

Health and Home

THE WOMAN WHO WORKS

In this new order of things, with women, both married and single, broadening their business activities, a very serious problem arises. It is the problem of what, when, and where to eat.

Breakfast is always a hurry-up meal for the men but much more so for the woman who goes to business. Luncheons, of course, are taken in the lunchrooms and restaurants in the business districts and are no problem. But how about dinners? Shall they, too, be restaurant meals or can they be so planned that business women may enjoy the home cooking of which they are so fond? Take away the element of haste and anxiety and in its place put carefully thought-out menus, well planned and easily prepared, and home dinners will again regain their high favor with the working housewife.

One of the big worries is frequently with the milk. Did it come? Is it fresh? Is it frozen? Has the milkman been paid? Are the bottles washed and set out? However, there is no cause for worry about milk. Why not keep a dozen cans of evaporated milk in your pantry? There are large cans, equal to a quart of milk and smaller cans that will meet the lesser needs.

For evaporated milk is just pure, fresh milk with more than half the water missing. This water can be replaced in a jiffy, if you so desire or you can use it as cream if rich and creamy foods are desired.

Here are a few recipes that may be used by "The Woman Who Works" for forming her plans for self help and good home cooking.

Scalloped Ham and Potatoes.

1 pound smoked ham	1¼ cups water
6 medium potatoes	1 green pepper (may be omitted)
1½ cups evaporated milk diluted with	Flour

Cover the bottom of an oiled baking dish with sliced, raw potatoes. Sprinkle with flour and pieces of ham ½ inch square. Repeat until dish is full. Fill dish ¾ full of diluted milk. Bake until potatoes are tender.

Eggs en Casserole

6 hard-boiled eggs	¾ cup evaporated milk
3 tomatoes	¾ cup water
2 tbsp. butter	½ cup grated cheese
3 tbsp. flour	Buttered crumbs
2 tsp. salt

Cut hard-boiled eggs in half and arrange around the edge of a greased casserole. Slice tomatoes in center of dish. Make a white sauce of the milk, water, fat and flour. Add cheese and stir over a low fire until cheese is well mixed and smooth. Pour over tomatoes and eggs. Cover with crumbs and bake twenty minutes in a moderate oven.

Tells How Girls Can Get "Line" on Fiance

Two angles of the prenuptial state which women should give careful consideration, so that they may be able to avoid the pitfalls of marriage, are pointed out by Doris Webster and Mary Alden Hopkins in an article in Liberty.

"First," warn the authors, "study his faults; second, observe him when he is angry. Under the first head list his failings and decide whether or not you can endure them; for, while his charm may disappear, his imperfections will remain. Decide whether or not you can live with him for fifty years. Do not make the common mistake of thinking that you can reform him, even in tiny matters like flicking cigarette ashes on the best china.

"Taking up the second point, we advise careful study of his emotional reactions. What does he get mad at? Get a line on him when he is twisting his mouth into a sneer or booming through his whiskers. How are you going to handle him when he is raging or sulking? One final piece of information we bestow upon questing damsels, and it will not do married women any harm to mull it over, too: No human being can change another individual's personality."

Electric Chair Death Denounced as Brutal

When the governor of New York in 1888 signed the bill that abolished hangings in the state and provided death by electric shock for certain classes of criminals, the people of New York arose and denounced it as a brutal measure.

It is hard for the present generation to understand the agitations and uproars caused by this step. In our day electricity is a household drudge, and electrocution has been established in 19 states.

But in the eighties electrical development was just beginning. To the average citizen there was something diabolical in the proposal to inflict death by such a terrible and unseen power. Preachers thundered against the chair from their pulpits. Newspapers condemned it in blistering editorials. Doctors and scientists were not even sure that electric current would kill.—Frederick Tisdale, in Liberty Magazine.

Hats Resemble Houses

In the Hawaiian islands, long before the inhabitants took the trouble to clothe themselves, they built grass houses, and at the present time the characteristic Hawaiian hat is remarkably like the hut.

The turbans of the dignitaries of the Eastern church are still of the shape of those worn by the high priests among the Jews of olden times, and they are extraordinarily like the characteristic domes that surmount mosques. Again, it is pointed out, the high pointed spires of Gothic churches were cotemporaneous with the high horn-like headdress known as the hennin. It is believed, too, that like results may be found after a comparison of other styles of architecture with the headgear of the period wherein they flourished.—Washington Star.

Quills Long in Use

Quills are supposed to have been used for writing pens in the Fifth century, though the conjecture rests mainly on an anecdote of Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, who, being so illiterate that he could not write even the initials of his own name, was provided with a plate of gold through which the letters were cut, and, this being placed on the paper when his signature was required, he traced the letters with a quill. The date of the earliest certain account of the modern writing pen is 636. The next notice occurs in the latter part of the same century, in a Latin sonnet to a pen by Aldhelm, a Saxon author. Steel pens were first made by Wise in England, in 1803.

Generous Enough

An old merchant, a landlord, of southern Indiana, quite wealthy, was riding majestically over his many acres after attending to some business with his tenantry. He was surprised in catching a man in one of his corn bins putting corn into a sack. Drawing up, he said:

"Say, what air you doin' there in my corncrib?"

"Why, can't you see?" the fellow answered. "I'm taking some of your corn."

Astounded at his boldness, the landlord was at first speechless. Finally, he managed to say:

"Well, tech as light on't as you can. Giddap."

Asbestos as Insulator

According to the E. M. F. Electrical Year Book, asbestos in its pure state, free from metallic oxides, is a good electrical insulator. It is very difficult to find asbestos free from iron or other impurities and for this reason it is a better thermal insulator than electrical. Frequently it is mixed with other fibers or binding materials to increase its mechanical strength and to improve the insulation properties, and it is then fabricated into paper or sheets, boards, tape, cloth, etc. It is used as an insulation for wires and cables exposed to high temperatures.

SELECTING THE KITCHEN TABLE

The first requirement of a kitchen table is that it be solid. The next, that it be the proper height. Not just so-many-inches from the floor, but conveniently high for the person who uses it most. It should have one or two drawers for cutlery, and may have an under-swung shelf.

The next problem is the matter of a top. For serving purposes the primary consideration is that the table top be impervious to heat. Hot dishes must be set on it, so a glass top would be likely to break, a painted or varnished one to blister.

The preparing table must be one that will clean easily, one that will resist moisture, and not stain with grease.

If, as in most kitchens, one table is to serve both purposes, the selection of a top should be a matter for extreme care.

The wooden top: Its principal advantages are cheapness, and the fact that fewer dishes are broken upon it. Its disadvantages are that it must be constantly scrubbed, that it absorbs water, gets stained and full of grease spots. Modern sanitation is slowly but surely driving out the wooden-topped kitchen table.

Oilcloth: This is a cheap cover, wears fairly well, and cleans easily. But it won't stand heat at all, and gets cut up by the use of knives.

Zinc covers are favored by some women. They are good wearing, but tarnish with acids and alkalis, so do not make the best place to lay out food.

The galvanized iron table is in many respects the best all-around kitchen table. It never wears out, is not affected by heat, does not stain or absorb grease. But in spite of that it is not the easiest table to clean.

The enamel-topped kitchen table has been steadily growing in popularity for a number of years. Its chief drawbacks in the past have been a liability to chip, and to blister with heat. Enamel, however, has been much perfected lately by enterprising manufacturers. If you can get one that is dependably guaranteed against chipping, even when you screw on the food grinder, and one that will stand the heat, it will, no doubt, give you more satisfaction than any other type of kitchen table.

WHY PATENT LEATHER CRACKS

"Will this patent leather crack?" is perhaps the one question heard oftener than any other from women shoppers in the shoe stores.

The handsome, glossy, black, smooth surface characteristic of patent leather, is made by treating dry, softened skins with successive coats of varnish, and baking after each application of varnish. Large, thin, firm hides are generally selected in the first place. Each of the coatings made of gums and vegetable oils are worked into the fiber, and thoroughly dried, before the next is given. The last coat is applied with a brush, and the leather baked for three days in an oven at a low temperature, and then finally exposed to the sunlight, which oxidizes the varnish, and gives the finish.

When the customer begins to wear the shoe, and the leather expands, as it frequently does when affected by the warmth and moisture of the foot, the coating of varnish, which is inelastic, and cannot expand with the leather, may crack. No manufacturer can tell whether the leather is going to crack or not, and for that reason it is seldom guaranteed. It does, however, frequently give good service. The finish is a very popular one, being especially suitable for semi-dress wear, but appropriate for almost any other occasion as well. This handsome leather brings out the lines of the shoe to the best advantage, and no polishing is necessary. The varnish is also an effective waterproofing.

Patent leather may be made from kid, colt, calf, and cowhide. Coltskin because of its firm, solid texture, is said to make the most satisfactory of all patent leathers. It is a problem for the shopper to know how to distinguish the better and poorer grades. However, recently invented varnish coatings are more pliant, and therefore less liable to crack. Patent leather was made in the United States as early as 1818, but only recently has the process attained its present excellence, until now it rivals the French and German finishes.

Careful Cutting Helps Woodlot

New York Farmer Cut $100 Worth of Fuel From Each Acre, Aiding Stand.

In a woodlot on the farm of Henry Kellogg of Barnes Corners in Lewis county, $100 worth of fuel wood was recently removed from each acre and the woodlot was left in better condition than before cutting, according to J. A. Cope, forester at Cornell university, who had charge of selecting and cutting the trees.

Woodlot Improvement.

This was part of a woodlot improvement campaign conducted by the Lewis county farm bureau in which Mr. Kellogg agreed to use his woodlands to show what could be done. An area was laid out in a 20-acre woodlot, and the trees marked to be cut were only those that were defective, crooked or were what are commonly called "weed" species.

At a woods meeting, attended by farmers of the community, the marked trees which had been carefully cut and ranked were measured. It was found that 80 15-inch cords of wood had been cut from each acre. This fuel wood had a roadside value of $200. Mr. Kellogg kept a record of time required to cut, haul and rank this wood, and found the 80 cords could be delivered to the roadside for $100, including sawing it into 15-inch lengths, thereby netting him a clear stumpage value of $100 an acre.

Saved Crop Trees.

The group next visited the lot where the cutting was done to see that the main crop trees of thrifty ash, basswood and hard maple had not been touched. The cutting had improved the condition of the stand so that the crowns of the remaining trees will be able to expand and thus diameter-growth will be greatly increased. Mr. Kellogg's experience indicated that, as far as Lewis county woodlots go, "you can eat your cake and have it, too," Mr. Cope says.

Stinking Smut Is Most Widely Spread Disease

Stinking smut is the most widely spread disease of wheat and next to black stem rust is the most destructive. It has been estimated to cause an annual loss in the United States of 25,000,000 bushels. Stinking smut grows within the wheat plant and eventually forms smut balls in the place of the kernels. It causes a general shrinkage in the outline of the head but does not otherwise greatly change the outward appearance of the head and can be detected in the field only by close examination or by scenting its odor which is similar to that of decaying fish. When the smutted wheat is threshed many of the smut balls are broken and some of the smut dust or spores is lodged on the surfaces of sound grains. If the smutted grain is sown, the smut spores germinate with the seed wheat and again develop within the plant. In this way the disease is carried from one crop to the next.

Individual Feeding of Dairy Cows Is Favored

Different cows have different capacities for converting feed into milk. No man who has not a full appreciation of the wide variation in individual cows will be fully successful as a feeder. Some cows may have natural capacity for producing large quantities of milk, and may not receive feed enough for maximum production. By increasing the feed of the highest-producing cows and carefully consulting the milk sheets on which each cow's daily production is recorded, the skillful feeder will soon find that some cows in the herd will respond to the increased allowance and return a good profit on the additional feed given. On the other hand, there are cows that have a limited capacity for milk production and are very liable to be overfed. By carefully studying each individual cow the feeder will soon ascertain the point beyond which any addition to the grain ration becomes unprofitable.

GIRL WORKS ISLAND CLAIM IN FAR NORTH

Canadian College Graduate Lives in Cabin.

Toronto.—Women are "sitting on the top of the world" in many fields of activity, but to Miss Kathleen Rice, graduate of the University of Toronto, goes the unusual distinction of active operations as a mining prospector.

Mining is one of the chief topics of conversation in Canada at present, but while the home woman, the business woman and the professional woman discuss how many shares of this or that they own, Miss Rice is working her claim. Her part in the romance of mining is a definite one. At present her base camp is on an island in Herb lake, or to use the more melodious Indian name, Wekusko lake, northern Manitoba. From this base she has worked since 1921. Here she lives in a log cabin that harks back to the days of the pioneers, and here she pioneers on one of her most promising claims, a copper and nickel vein on an island, within a stone's throw of her cabin. Hard work has been tangled up in the romance, and Miss Rice had considerable difficulty in proving the claim. Now, however, she is receiving encouragement, for engineers on the ground have pronounced the prospects good.

Totes a Gun.

Kathleen Rice is one of those "girls of the great open spaces who tote guns," seen often on the screen as being typical of Canada, but very rare, indeed, in the Canada of real life. Most women would be satisfied to gain distinction in man's field by prospecting in the summer, but Miss Rice adds further laurels to her outdoor reputation by trapping in the winter. In this way she actually is successful enough to make her stake for summer operations. While she uses a gun like a veteran, she never shoots for sport. Once, when a moose fell to her rifle she preserved the meat for future use.

Devotion to animals is one of Miss Rice's outstanding characteristics. Always, in the North, she is seen with and known by her famous dogs. Despite the unwritten law of the north country, she ignores and never uses the lash. In this matter she has the full approval of the dogs, who not only shower her with devotion but repay her by being the best trained dogs within hundreds of miles.

Lone Venture.

It is now 15 years since Miss Rice, daughter of Henry Lincoln Rice, B. A., of Toronto, went North on a lone venture. The spirit of adventure was financed by a college chum from Chicago, who staked her when she homesteaded in the name of her brother, Lincoln Rice, of St. Mary's, Ontario. The young Canadian girl was tired of cities and classrooms. She longed for the North; felt "the call of wind-swept places," so she left her position as a mathematics specialist in an Ontario high school and hiked to an unknown land. The rest of the story is teeming with adventure; her richest gold quartz claim is on the shore of Herb lake, in the line of strike with the Bingo, Rex and Kimini mines. Because Starr is a family name, she calls it the Starr claim. The name connects the Rice family with the earliest New England settlement. This claim shows not only gold but other high mineral values. She was one of the first prospectors in the North to find vanadium.

Danish Student Called "Busiest Man in Pitt"

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Christian Neilson, a Danish student at the University of Pittsburgh, has won the distinction of being called the "busiest man in Pitt."

Neilson, registered for a premedical course, is doing two full-time jobs each day. He carries on a full schedule of studies and works eight hours a day as railroad weightmaster at Aliquippa, near-by steel center. He travels 50 miles each day to go to and from the university.

Injured several years ago while with the Danish merchant marine, he was left at Baltimore to recuperate. Later he came to this district, completed a four-year high school course in three years with highest honors and entered college. When he was left in Baltimore he could not speak a word of English. Now he speaks the language flawlessly.

Puts Color in Leaves and Finds Trick Pays

Jacksonville, Fla.—Green oak leaves take an autumnal turn in about five minutes in the factory here of Dr. Henry Dux, who rouges nature's cheeks so successfully that he finds a ready market for his goods.

In Doctor Dux's factory leaves and plants used by florists are so prepared as to make them last indefinitely without becoming brittle and without losing their natural beauty.

The head of the factory, a licensed physician, says the process of treatment of the leaves, plants and ferns that come to his workshop for beautification is secret

Find Old Ballot

Lexington, Va.—"For President, Jefferson Davis of Mississippi," is the heading of a faded ballot presented to the Lee museum of Washington and Lee university. The ballot, found in an ante-bellum home at Petersburg, Va., was used in the first and only Presidential election of the Confederacy and bears the date November 15, 1861.

Dove Gray Broadcloth for Street, Afternoon

A street costume and afternoon frock are smartly combined in this clever outfit. Dove gray broadcloth is the material used, and the collar and cuffs are chinchilla fur. The skirt is circular and the waist is fashioned in the manner of a loose jacket.

Powder Puff With Top Representing Dancer

An attractive powder puff with the top or handle made after the ballet dancer design has now appeared in a new rubberized wax, tinted and painted in lifelike manner. The puff may be of marabou in white or pastel shades. Containers for holding the powder are supplied, although many persons use an ordinary powder box, since this puff is fluffy enough to conceal any unattractive part of the cardboard. Because of its rubberized material, the puff may be dropped without fear of breaking. For the sake of novelty its head and arms are free to move in any direction.

A new box from Paris designed for holiday use is being shown now. It comes in three tiers, each one attached to the other by small bracelets. The top opens independently of the other two parts, although all three may be used at the same time. They are covered with metallic brocades in tangerine ecclesiastical red, jade and black.

For the dressing table or top of a dresser there is a new tray set made of imitation or real stone in natural and artificial colors. The trays are oval and bordered with low rims. At one side is a swivel mirror supported between two slender glass posts with ends studded with jewels. It is mounted in a frame that matches the border of the tray. The other objects consist of a large bottle with jeweled stopper, an atomizer with its neck finished with a metal band set with small jewels, a powder box, also banded about the top in the same color.

Wool Frocks Worn for Warmth and for Style

Previous seasons have been notable for the preponderance of silk frocks which when the weather necessitated, early or late, were worn beneath the fur coat. Since all fashions must bend to the laws of change, the silk frock and fur wrap combination may be slightly displaced by woolen ensembles before the more severe weather arrives. It would seem that the couturier had grown a trifle weary of wrapping milady in silk and fur. Perhaps that is why it is so extremely fashionable to appear attired in a modish costume of wool.

A two-piece dress of tweed bordered and patterned in a dot theme is one example of the decreed mode for informal wear. Printed jersey is chic when in a plaid design. The background of one model is of pale green and the plaid of two darker shades and black.

Metal Animals in Color for New Hat Ornaments

A hat ornament that is attracting considerable attention now has designs of animals in color, so put on as to imitate fine enamel work. They are outlined with metal.

Another ornament for the sports costume is a metal fob with a small, narrow barpin like those used on badges, with two chains of modernistic design, to which a round, square or oblong disk is attached.

Chinchilla Is Liked to Trim Wine Red Coat

Wine red is a winter color overshadowed in importance by black and blue only. Philippe et Gaston show a straight line coat with simple encrustations in burgundy red wool. Its upstanding collar of chinchilla is discretion itself by contrast with some of the wide, full collars of the season. The sleeves are without fur.

Open Old Drains and Plan Some New Ones

Spring Is Time to Clean Out Ditches.

Spring rains and freshets make the farmer think of drainage, says the State College of Agriculture at Ithaca, and there is no better time to lay out tile drains and ditches than at this season of the year.

Many farmers, says the college, make it a practice in March or April every year to start out and go over their farms with a shovel over their shoulders, and a handful of sharpened small stakes. The shovel is for cleaning the outlets of the drains now installed, and the stakes are for laying out new ones.

Tile drains are an investment, and the chief returns come in saving time in getting on the land in the spring. If the outlets are stopped up, they do not take care of the excess water as they should, and their purpose is defeated. To get real returns on the investment, nothing should be allowed to keep the drains from discharging the surface and excess soil water rapidly.

And while this is being done, says the college, there is no better time than early spring to locate the wet spots in the field and see where they should naturally drain. Watching where the surface water goes will generally give an idea as to the best natural outlet, and stakes should be set for future reference when the ditches can be dug.

One little wet spot may spoil the appearance and usefulness of a whole field, making it necessary to turn around in the middle of the lot, or to altogether forego the planting of certain crops. Drain the wet spots, says the college, and put the whole field on the same basis.

Ancients Knew Value of Ultra-Violet Ray

While we attribute the discovery of the ultra-violet ray to a Nineteenth-century scientist, the use of it in the treatment of disease is of ancient origin. Sun treatments are known to have been given about 2,000 years ago and probably date back much further, because the practice of sun worship is very old. For various reasons sun treatments became a lost art until the Eighteenth century. Since that time they have enjoyed an increasing popularity.

The discovery that the ultra-violet in the sun's rays was largely responsible for many of the beneficial effects probably was one of the greatest single advancements made in heliotherapy. Immediately new fields were opened and much more careful scientific studies were made. Heliotherapy, the art, began to take on the aspects of a science.

It is not a full-grown science yet, however, for much remains to be learned, and until there is closer co-operation between physicians and physicists there is little hope that it will become full grown. Neither the physician nor the physicist is sufficiently well informed in the other's field to permit him to undertake intelligent investigations in ultra-violet therapy. Probably in many instances one is unwilling to call upon the other for aid lest he lose credit to himself thereby. Fortunately, however, the need for united effort is being recognized to a greater and greater extent, so that within the next few years many facts concerning the use of ultra-violet in therapy should be brought to light.—Donald C. Stockbarger in the North American Review.

Wintering Herd Bull

Beef breeders winter the bull away from the herd, but too often he is kept in a dark, dirty stall, without exercise. Exercise, protection from weather, and a moderate ration will keep him in good condition.

Build a strong stall in a corner of the cow barn, with a strong paddock or corral adjoining, or a cable can be run from stall to some point about 50 feet from the barn; a short, strong chain run from the ring in the bull's nose to a ring on the cable.

Good Seed Important

GOOD seed is essential for success with oats. Home-grown seed usually is preferable, provided the seed stock represents a high-yielding strain of a variety adapted to local conditions. The variety also should be reasonably free from admixtures of other varieties.

The germinability of oats usually is good. Oats that have been well cured in the shock or stack and have been stored properly usually will retain their viability for several years. If, however, there is doubt regarding viability of the seed, a test should be made. This may be done by placing 100 seeds on a wet blotter or wet cloth in the bottom of a dinner plate or pie tin. Cover this seed with another wet blotter or wet cloth over which a second plate or pie tin, preferably a slightly smaller one, is placed bottom upward. Keep the seed in a moderately warm room. At the end of five days it should be possible to count the number of seeds which have germinated. From 95 to 98 per cent. should germinate.

Oats to be used for seed should be fanned and graded. Very light grain frequently do not contain a kernel and can not germinate even if sown. Fanning and grading oats to the extent that only the very largest and plumpest seeds remain is not necessary. Fanning and screening to remove weed seeds can not be overemphasized, as the eradication of noxious weeds is one of the most important problems of agriculture in the Corn Belt today.

HOW

VAUDEVILLE "STRONG MAN" GETS AWAY WITH TRICK.—Strong men on the music hall stage are fond of lying on their backs and having placed on the chest an anvil, which is subjected to blows from a heavy sledge hammer. As a "turn" it invariably creates astonishment but any man could do it, provided he were strong enough in the first place to support the heavy anvil. The blows inflicted by the sledge hammer are negative.

Scientists explain this by what is known as action and reaction, which are always equal. The anvil strikes the hammer as forcibly as the hammer strikes the anvil, and should the anvil be heavier than the hammer, it will not be moved. Suppose the hammer weighs 10 pounds and moves with a velocity of 16 feet per second, it will strike the anvil with a force of 160 pounds; but the anvil, perhaps, weighs 220 pounds, and in consequence will not be moved. Thus the "strong" man is able to receive the weight of the blows without discomfort.

How Phrase "To Walk Spanish" Is Explained

"To walk Spanish" refers to an old sport among boys in which one boy seizes another by the collar or the scruff of the neck and the seat of the trousers and forces him along on tiptoe. "To walk turkey" is used in the same sense. Apparently the former expression originated in New England. At any rate, the earliest known uses of "to walk Spanish" occur in writings from that section. The application of "Spanish" in the phrase is obscure. It may, as some suppose, allude to the manner in which the old Spanish pirates are reputed to have handled their prisoners when starting them out on the plank. "To walk Spanish" has acquired a large variety of meanings in popular parlance. We make another walk Spanish when we discharge him from his job, when we make him step along gingerly, or when we compel him to do anything against his will. Likewise a person is said to walk Spanish when he struts, and also when he walks with an unsteady gait. More often the term is equivalent to "toe the line" or "come up to the mark."—Exchange

How Snowflakes Form.

Snow forms over an ascending air current in which there are solidified cloud particles for nuclei. But whatever the nuclei may be, as soon as the initial crystals are formed further condensation takes place, the vapor condensing directly into the solid state without first going through the liquid state. The crystals of water are hexagonal prisms, explains the Scientific American, and water in the crystalline state in the atmosphere shows all the wonderful shapes that this form of crystalization can take. Having once started, the crystals may grow either along their central axis, giving rise to long thin prisms, or along their six axes to form hexagonial plates. Sometimes a growth is uniform, so that the result is a perfect hexagonal plate; at others the growth along the axes is more rapid than in the space between. This gives rise to star-shaped crystals.

How Emeralds Are Mined.

A great many of the emeralds on the market today are obtained from the republic of Colombia. The Muzo emeralds of that country occur in calcite veins. The bank may prove worthless after months of work, for no one can estimate the probable value of any particular section of a deposit. In this way emerald mining is different from most other branches of the industry. The tools used are steel bars about five feet long, weighing 30 pounds, and shovels. The bars are forged to a point at one end and made wedge-shaped on the other. Great care must be exercised in mining emeralds owing to the risk of breaking them. Skilled natives are generally employed to do this work.

How to Clean Grass Rug.

Wash the rug with water in which bran has been boiled, or in weak salt and water. Dry it well with a cloth. To remove grease from the rug wet a nailbrush in slightly salted water, rub on soap and scrub the place hard. Have the water boiling. Continue to scrub with soap until the spot disappears. Wash with clean cloth and rub dry. Always rub lengthwise of the grain

How to Remove Rust.

To remove rust spots from nickel plated surfaces, apply petrolatum (vaseline) and after several days wipe with a cloth dipped in ammonia. In case the spots are particularly stubborn, add a few drops of hydrochloric acid to the ammonia, but be sure to dry the metal quickly; then rinse it with water and polish thoroughly.—Popular Science Monthly.

How Money Makes Money.

New York's oldest savings account was opened with $10 in 1819; $5 were added the following year, and no further deposit has ever been made.

The original bank book, held by the descendant of the depositor, recently showed approximately $2,300 in accumulated interest.

MUCH EXPECTED OF AL SHARPE

Look to Coach to Place His Team Among Leaders.

Dr. Al Sharpe, famous Eastern athletic authority who is now in his first year as head football coach at Washington university, is expected by alumni and fans of the Mrytle to gradually place the school among the athletics leaders of the Mid-West.

Sharpe has signed a five-year contract as director of athletics and is not required to coach football. A great love for the game, however, prompted the veteran mentor to resume actual coaching this season although his last actual field work was in 1919—his last as head football coach at Yale.

Sharpe was a great athlete at Yale. Although he was a star of the first magnitude in football he also made letters in basket ball, track, baseball and gymnastics. After graduation in 1920 he immediately went to William Penn Charter academy—his prep school alma mater—where he coached until 1912. That year found him transfering to Cornell where he established a record as one of the outstanding grid coaches in the game. His 1915 team at Cornell was unbeaten and such elevens as Pennsylvania and Harvard were defeated.

Al Sharpe.

In 1919 he became head coach at Yale but surrendered the football work after one year and devoted himself to athletic direction work until 1921. Since then he has been head of the Ithaca School of Physical Education at Ithaca, N. Y. In recent years he has officiated in leading Eastern college games.

Under Sharpe a new spirit has arisen at Washington and although material is none too plentiful this year a good team is gradually being molded.

'Gators "Ike and Mike" Main Cogs at Football

They have the same name, play the same position, weigh the same, but are different, yet they are apt to be two outstanding cogs in the 1928 football machine at the University of Florida.

Jus Clemons, star varsity tackle last year, hails from Plant City and spells his name with one "m." Ben Clemmons, ace lineman of the freshman last season, who resides in Tallahassee, spells his name with two "m's."

Jus is a brunette, and Ben is a blond. They say ladies prefer blonds, but in the opinion of Charles W. Bachman, Florida's new gridiron mentor, they both look "mighty good." Nineteen twenty-eight will be Jus Clemons' last year with the varsity, but it will be Ben's initial season up. Ben was a center last year and is a fullback of much ability also, but Coach Bachman's idea is to have the boys with the same name, but who spell that name differently, playing his leading tackle roles.

Pitchers Not Supposed to Hit Safely Anyhow

Back in the olden days, the outfielders possessed strong throwing arms. The story is told of a particular game between New York and Washington in 1898. George Van Haltren was playing center field for the Giants and Pitcher Cy Swain of Washington was at bat. The latter hit what appeared to be a sure single to center. Van Haltren made a mad dash and gathered the ball in on the second bound. Without stopping, he threw to first and beat the slow-footed Swain by quite a margin.

As Swain walked back to the bench, he naturally felt that the whole world was against him. He stopped to take a drink of water and one of the players yelled, "Oh, well, pitchers aren't supposed to hit safe anyhow."

Pugilist Monte Munn May Run for Congress

Monte Munn, who played football in the Nebraska line several years ago and then turned pugilist, is now in the Cornhusker state, having returned from a journey including South America and Europe, to conduct the state Hoover campaign.

When he is not immersed in politics, he will be found on the sidelines of the gridiron at Lincoln; for there is no more loyal supporter of the Nebraska outfit than he.

When the election has been held and the football season is over and he has time and opportunity to plot out his future, it is believed the big college battler will decide to run for con[illegible] where he is very [illegible]

WHY

Keyboard of Typewriter Is So Arranged.

Explaining why the keys on the typewriter are placed as they are one typewriter company says: "The first commercially successful typewriter, which was placed on the market about fifty years ago, contained a keyboard almost identical with that used at the present time. The retention of this keyboard is undoubtedly due to the fact that hundreds of thousands of typists have learned it, so that it has become practically universal, and prejudice against a change causes manufacturers to continue arranging the letters in accordance with the desires of the majority of those who use it. When all is said and done, the present arrangement is a pretty good one. To attempt to make a radical scientific change would, in our opinion, not be feasible. J and K might be rearranged with advantage. We do not know why these particular letters were placed on the second row of keys. Certainly their position is not the best for a touch typist. However, touch typewriting was not known in the early days of the typewriter, so that the position of J and K was not so important at the time the order of letters was arranged. The reason for the present arrangement has never been satisfactorily explained so far as we know. We think the printers' case had something to do with the arrangement, and also that the arrangement was affected by the fact that the keys were in a circular basket and this arrangement to some extent prevented the keys from clashing. We think also that whoever arranged the letters had some thought for the sequence of the letters and tried, as far as possible, to harmonize the different points we have mentioned."

Why So Many Dislike to Walk Under Ladder

There is an old superstition, which is still quite common, that it is unlucky to walk under a ladder. How the belief originated is not known. One writer suggests it may have arisen from the fact that in early times culprits were often hanged from ladders propped against buildings. Another believes that the superstition is the natural outgrowth of the danger incident to walking under ladders. According to the most usual version of the superstition, ill luck will follow a person who walks under a ladder, unless he stops to make a wish, in which event no ill luck will befall him. Moreover, the wish made under such circumstances will come true. In England the superstition has a special provision, namely, if an unmarried woman walks under the ladder she will not be married within a year. It is also considered unlucky to walk on a ladder lying on the ground.—Exchange.

Why Wesley Rose Early.

John Wesley, the great preacher, was anxious to waste no time unnecessarily in sleep. Finding he woke every night about one and lay sleepless for some hours, he concluded that he was lying in bed longer than nature demanded. He determined, therefore, to rise an hour earlier than usual. Rising at seven, he found himself still waking in the night, so the next morning rose at six and the next at five. Still there was the wakeful interval though a shorter one. The fourth morning he rose at four. That night his sleep was unbroken, and at four he continued to rise every morning. "By the same experiment," he suggested, "rising earlier and earlier every morning, anyone may find out how much sleep he really wants."

Why Windows "Sweat."

The sweating of windows is due to imperfect ventilation, and if perfect ventilation could be obtained it would probably give the most effective results. In many cases openings are made in the sash, top and bottom, so that a current of cold air may cover the interior side of the glass. In some instances, where the sweating of windows is not bad, 55 grams of glycerin is dissolved in 1 liter of alcohol (63 per cent), to which a little amber oil is added. As soon as it is thoroughly mixed, it may be rubbed on the inside surface of the window with a chamois or linen rag. A thin coat of pure glycerin applied to both sides of the glass will prevent moisture.

Why "Wild Goose Chase."

A phrase with an interesting history is "a wild goose chase." The term was first used to describe a kind of horse racing which resembled the follow-my-leader flight peculiar to wild geese. Two horses would run a hundred and twenty yards; then the jockey who had the lead was at liberty to take whatever ground he pleased, the other being bound to follow within a specified distance or else be whipped-in by judges who rode by; the passing and repassing of one another went on until one horse fell out through sheer exhaustion, thus giving the other equally overdriven animal a final lead.

Why the Term "In Clover."

A person is said to be in clover when he is lucky, in prosperous circumstances or in a good situation. The phrase alludes to cattle feeding in clover fields, the best kind of pasture imaginable.

Why Captain Is "Skipper."

The term "skipper" as applied to the captain of a vessel is derived from the Dutch, who calls a ship a "schip" and the chief "schipper" or sailor, [illegible]

GIRL WORKS ISLAND CLAIM IN FAR NORTH

Canadian College Graduate Lives in Cabin.

Toronto.—Women are "sitting on the top of the world" in many fields of activity, but to Miss Kathleen Rice, graduate of the University of Toronto, goes the unusual distinction of active operations as a mining prospector.

Mining is one of the chief topics of conversation in Canada at present, but while the home woman, the business woman and the professional woman discuss how many shares of this or that they own, Miss Rice is working her claim. Her part in the romance of mining is a definite one. At present her base camp is on an island in Herb lake, or to use the more melodious Indian name, Wekusko lake, northern Manitoba. From this base she has worked since 1921. Here she lives in a log cabin that harks back to the days of the pioneers, and here she pioneers on one of her most promising claims, a copper and nickel vein on an island, within a stone's throw of her cabin. Hard work has been tangled up in the romance, and Miss Rice had considerable difficulty in proving the claim. Now, however, she is receiving encouragement, for engineers on the ground have pronounced the prospects good.

Totes a Gun.

Kathleen Rice is one of those "girls of the great open spaces who tote guns," seen often on the screen as being typical of Canada, but very rare, indeed, in the Canada of real life. Most women would be satisfied to gain distinction in man's field by prospecting in the summer, but Miss Rice adds further laurels to her outdoor reputation by trapping in the winter. In this way she actually is successful enough to make her stake for summer operations. While she uses a gun like a veteran, she never shoots for sport. Once, when a moose fell to her rifle she preserved the meat for future use.

Devotion to animals is one of Miss Rice's outstanding characteristics. Always, in the North, she is seen with and known by her famous dogs. Despite the unwritten law of the north country, she ignores and never uses the lash. In this matter she has the full approval of the dogs, who not only shower her with devotion but repay her by being the best trained dogs within hundreds of miles.

Lone Venture.

It is now 15 years since Miss Rice, daughter of Henry Lincoln Rice, B. A., of Toronto, went North on a lone venture. The spirit of adventure was financed by a college chum from Chicago, who staked her when she homesteaded in the name of her brother, Lincoln Rice, of St. Mary's, Ontario. The young Canadian girl was tired of cities and classrooms. She longed for the North; felt "the call of wind-swept places," so she left her position as a mathematics specialist in an Ontario high school and hiked to an unknown land. The rest of the story is teeming with adventure; her richest gold quartz claim is on the shore of Herb lake, in the line of strike with the Bingo, Rex and Kinski mines. Because Starr is a family name, she calls it the Starr claim. The name connects the Rice family with the earliest New England settlement. This claim shows not only gold but other high mineral values. She was one of the first prospectors in the North to find vanadium.

Danish Student Called "Busiest Man in Pitt"

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Christian Neilson, a Danish student at the University of Pittsburgh, has won the distinction of being called the "busiest man in Pitt."

Neilson, registered for a premedical course, is doing two full-time jobs each day. He carries on a full schedule of studies and works eight hours a day as railroad weightmaster at Allquippa, near-by steel center. He travels 50 miles each day to go to and from the university.

Injured several years ago while with the Danish merchant marine, he was left at Baltimore to recuperate. Later he came to this district, completed a four-year high school course in three years with highest honors and entered college. When he was left in Baltimore he could not speak a word of English. Now he speaks the language flawlessly.

Puts Color in Leaves and Finds Trick Pays

Jacksonville, Fla.—Green oak leaves take an autumnal turn in about five minutes in the factory here of Dr. Henry Dux, who rouges nature's cheeks so successfully that he finds a ready market for his goods.

In Doctor Dux's factory leaves and plants used by florists are so prepared as to make them last indefinitely without becoming brittle and without losing their natural beauty.

The head of the factory, a licensed physician, says the process of treatment of the leaves, plants and ferns that come to his workshop for beautification is secret.

Find Old Ballot

Lexington, Va.—"For President Jefferson Davis of Mississippi," is the heading of a faded ballot presented to the Lee museum of Washington and Lee university. The ballot, found in an ante-bellum home at Petersburg, Va., was used in the first and only Presidential election of the Confederacy and bears the date November 15, 1[illegible]1.

Dove Gray Broadcloth for Street, Afternoon

A street costume and afternoon frock are smartly combined in this clever outfit. Dove gray broadcloth is the material used, and the collar and cuffs are chinchilla fur. The skirt is circular and the waist is fashioned in the manner of a loose jacket.

Powder Puff With Top Representing Dancer

An attractive powder puff with the top or handle made after the ballet dancer design has now appeared in a new rubberized wax, tinted and painted in lifelike manner. The puff may be of marabou in white or pastel shades. Containers for holding the powder are supplied, although many persons use an ordinary powder box, since this puff is fluffy enough to conceal any unattractive part of the cardboard. Because of its rubberized material, the puff may be dropped without fear of breaking. For the sake of novelty its head and arms are free to move in any direction.

A new box from Paris designed for holiday use is being shown now. It comes in three tiers, each one attached to the other by small bracelets. The top opens independently of the other two parts, although all three may be used at the same time. They are covered with metallic brocades in tangerine ecclesiastical red, jade and black.

For the dressing table or top of a dresser there is a new tray set made of imitation or real stone in natural and artificial colors. The trays are oval and bordered with low rims. At one side is a swivel mirror supported between two slender glass posts with ends studded with jewels. It is mounted in a frame that matches the border of the tray. The other objects consist of a large bottle with jeweled stopper, an atomizer with its neck finished with a metal band set with small jewels, a powder box, also banded about the top in the same color.

Wool Frocks Worn for Warmth and for Style

Previous seasons have been notable for the preponderance of silk frocks which when the weather necessitated, early or late, were worn beneath the fur coat. Since all fashions must bend to the laws of change, the silk frock and fur wrap combination may be slightly displaced by woolen ensembles before the more severe weather arrives. It would seem that the couturier had grown a trifle weary of wrapping milady in silk and fur. Perhaps that is why it is so extremely fashionable to appear attired in a modish costume of wool.

A two-piece dress of tweed bordered and patterned in a dot theme is one example of the decreed mode for informal wear. Printed jersey is chic when in a plaid design. The background of one model is of pale green and the plaid of two darker shades and black.

Metal Animals in Color for New Hat Ornaments

A hat ornament that is attracting considerable attention now has designs of animals in color, so put on as to imitate fine enamel work. They are outlined with metal.

Another ornament for the sports costume is a metal fob with a small, narrow barpin like those used on badges, with two chains of modernistic design, to which a round, square or oblong disk is attached.

Chinchilla Is Liked to Trim Wine Red Coat

Wine red is a winter color overshadowed in importance by black and blue only. Philippe et Gaston show a straight line coat with simple encrustations in burgundy red wool. Its upstanding collar of chinchilla is discretion itself by contrast with some of the wide, full collars of the season. The sleeves are without fur.

Open Old Drains and Plan Some New Ones

Spring Is Time to Clean Out Ditches.

Spring rains and freshets make the farmer think of drainage, says the State College of Agriculture at Ithaca, and there is no better time to lay out tile drains and ditches than at this season of the year.

Many farmers, says the college, make it a practice in March or April every year to start out and go over their farms with a shovel over their shoulders, and a handful of sharpened small stakes. The shovel is for cleaning the outlets of the drains now installed, and the stakes are for laying out new ones.

Tile drains are an investment, and the chief returns come in saving time in getting on the land in the spring. If the outlets are stopped up, they do not take care of the excess water as they should, and their purpose is defeated. To get real returns on the investment, nothing should be allowed to keep the drains from discharging the surface and excess soil water rapidly.

And while this is being done, says the college, there is no better time than early spring to locate the wet spots in the field and see where they should naturally drain. Watching where the surface water goes will generally give an idea as to the best natural outlet, and stakes should be set for future reference when the ditches can be dug.

One little wet spot may spoil the appearance and usefulness of a whole field, making it necessary to turn around in the middle of the lot, or to altogether forego the planting of certain crops. Drain the wet spots, says the college, and put the whole field on the same basis.

Ancients Knew Value of Ultra-Violet Ray

While we attribute the discovery of the ultra-violet ray to a Nineteenth-century scientist, the use of it in the treatment of disease is of ancient origin. Sun treatments are known to have been given about 2,000 years ago, and probably date back much farther, because the practice of sun worship is very old. For various reasons sun treatments became a lost art until the Eighteenth century. Since that time they have enjoyed an increasing popularity.

The discovery that the ultra-violet in the sun's rays was largely responsible for many of the beneficial effects probably was one of the greatest single advancements made in heliotherapy. Immediately new fields were opened and much more careful scientific studies were made. Heliotherapy, the art, began to take on the aspects of a science.

It is not a full-grown science yet, however, for much remains to be learned, and until there is closer co-operation between physicians and physicists there is little hope that it will become full grown. Neither the physician nor the physicist is sufficiently well informed in the other's field to permit him to undertake intelligent investigations in ultra-violet therapy. Probably in many instances one is unwilling to call upon the other for aid lest he lose credit to himself thereby. Fortunately, however, the need for united effort is being recognized to a greater and greater extent, so that within the next few years many facts concerning the use of ultra-violet in therapy should be brought to light.—Donald C. Stockbarger in the North American Review.

Wintering Herd Bull

Few breeders winter the bull away from the herd, but too often he is kept in a dark, dirty stall, without exercise. Exercise, protection from weather, and a moderate ration will keep him in good condition.

Build a strong stall in a corner of the cow barn, with a strong paddock or corral adjoining, or a cable can be run from stall to some point about [illegible]0 feet from the barn; a short, strong chain run from the ring in the bull's nose to a ring on the cable.

Good Seed Important

GOOD seed is essential for success with oats. Home-grown seed usually is preferable, provided the seed stock represents a high-yielding strain of a variety adapted to local conditions. The variety also should be reasonably free from admixtures of other varieties.

The germinability of oats usually is good. Oats that have been well cured in the shock or stack and have been stored properly usually will retain their viability for several years. If, however, there is doubt regarding viability of the seed a test should be made. This may be done by placing 100 seeds on a wet blotter or wet cloth in the bottom of a [illegible] plate or pie tin. Cover this [illegible] with another wet blotter or wet cloth over which a second plate or pie tin, preferably a slightly [illegible], is placed bottom upward. [illegible] the seed in a moderately warm [illegible]. At the end of five days it should be possible to count the number of [illegible] which have germinated. From 95 to 98 per cent should germinate.

Oats to be used for [illegible] should be fanned and graded. Very light [illegible] frequently do not contain a germ and can not germinate [illegible]. Fanning and [illegible] oats to the [illegible] that only the very [illegible] plumpest seeds remain is not necessary. Fanning and [illegible] to remove weed seeds can not be overemphasized, as the introduction of noxious weeds is one of the most important [illegible] in [illegible].

HOW

VAUDEVILLE "STRONG MAN" GETS AWAY WITH TRICK.—Strong men on the music hall stage are fond of lying on their backs and having placed on the chest an anvil, which is subjected to blows from a heavy sledge hammer. As a "turn" it invariably creates astonishment but any man could do it, provided he were strong enough in the first place to support the heavy anvil. The blows inflicted by the sledge hammer are negative.

Scientists explain this by what is known as action and reaction, which are always equal. The anvil strikes the hammer as forcibly as the hammer strikes the anvil, and should the anvil be heavier than the hammer, it will not be moved. Suppose the hammer weighs 10 pounds and moves with a velocity of 16 feet per second, it will strike the anvil with a force of 160 pounds; but the anvil, perhaps, weighs 22[illegible] pounds, and in consequence will not be moved. Thus the "strong" man is able to receive the weight of the blows without discomfort.

How Phrase "To Walk Spanish" Is Explained

"To walk Spanish" refers to an old sport among boys in which one boy seizes another by the collar or the scruff of the neck and the seat of the trousers and forces him along on tiptoe. "To walk turkey" is used in the same sense. Apparently the former expression originated in New England. At any rate, the earliest known uses of "to walk Spanish" occur in writings from that section. The application of "Spanish" in the phrase is obscure. It may, as some suppose, allude to the manner in which the old Spanish pirates are reputed to have handled their prisoners when starting them out on the plank. "To walk Spanish" has acquired a large variety of meanings in popular parlance. We make another walk Spanish when we discharge him from his job, when we make him step along gingerly, or when we compel him to do anything against his will. Likewise a person is said to walk Spanish when he struts, and also when he walks with an unsteady gait. More often the term is equivalent to "toe the line" or "come up to the mark."—Exchange.

How Snowflakes Form.

Snow forms over an ascending air current in which there are solidified cloud particles for nuclei. But whatever the nuclei may be, as soon as the initial crystals are formed further condensation takes place, the vapor condensing directly into the solid state without first going through the liquid state. The crystals of water are hexagonal prisms, explains the Scientific American, and water in the crystalline state in the atmosphere shows all the wonderful shapes that this form of crystalization can take. Having once started, the crystals may grow either along their central axis, giving rise to long thin prisms, or along their six axes to form hexagonial plates. Sometimes a growth is uniform, so that the result is a perfect hexagonal plate; at others the growth along the axes is more rapid than in the space between. This gives rise to star-shaped crystals.

How Emeralds Are Mined.

A great many of the emeralds on the market today are obtained from the republic of Colombia. The Muzo emeralds of that country occur in calcite veins. The bank may prove worthless after months of work, for no one can estimate the probable value of any particular section of a deposit. In this way emerald mining is different from most other branches of the industry. The tools used are steel bars about five feet long, weighing 30 pounds, and shovels. The bars are forged to a point at one end and made wedge-shaped on the other. Great care must be exercised in mining emeralds owing to the risk of breaking them. Skilled natives are generally employed to do this work.

How to Clean Grass Rug.

Wash the rug with water in which bran has been boiled, or in weak salt and water. Dry it well with a cloth. To remove grease from the rug wet a nailbrush in slightly salted water, rub on soap and scrub the place hard. Have the water boiling. Continue to scrub with soap until the spot disappears. Wash with clean cloth and rub dry. Always rub lengthwise of the grain.

How to Remove Rust.

To remove rust spots from nickel plated surfaces, apply petrolatum (vaseline) and after several days wipe with a cloth dipped in ammonia. In case the spots are particularly stubborn, add a few drops of hydrochloric acid to the ammonia, but be sure to dry the metal quickly; then rinse it with water and polish thoroughly.—Popular Science Monthly.

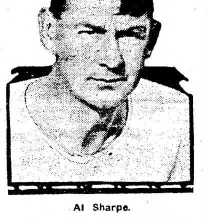
MUCH EXPECTED OF AL SHARPE

Look to Coach to Place His Team Among Leaders.

Dr. Al Sharpe, famous Eastern athletic authority who is now in his first year as head football coach at Washington university, is expected by alumni and fans of the Mrytle to gradually place the school among the athletics leaders of the Mid-West.

Sharpe has signed a five-year contract as director of athletics and is not required to coach football. A great love for the game, however, prompted the veteran mentor to resume actual coaching this season although his last actual field work was in 1919—his last as head football coach at Yale.

Sharpe was a great athlete at Yale. Although he was a star of the first magnitude in football he also made letters in basket ball, track, baseball and gymnastics. After graduation in 1920 he immediately went to William Penn Charter academy—his prep school alma mater—where he coached until 1912. That year found him transfering to Cornell where he established a record as one of the outstanding grid coaches in the game. His 1915 team at Cornell was unbeaten and such elevens as Pennsylvania and Harvard were defeated.



Al Sharpe.

In 1919 he became head coach at Yale but surrendered the football work after one year and devoted himself to athletic direction work until 1921. Since then he has been head of the Ithaca School of Physical Education at Ithaca, N. Y. In recent years he has officiated in leading Eastern college games.

Under Sharpe a new spirit has arisen at Washington and although material is none too plentiful this year a good team is gradually being molded.

'Gators "Ike and Mike" Main Cogs at Football

They have the same name, play the same position, weigh the same, but are different, yet they are apt to be two outstanding cogs in the 1928 football machine at the University of Florida.

Jus Clemons, star varsity tackle last year, hails from Plant City and spells his name with one "m." Ben Clemmons ace linesman of the freshman last season, who resides in Tallahassee, spells his name with two "m's."

Jus is a brunette, and Ben is a blond. They say ladies prefer blonds, but in the opinion of Charles W. Bachman, Florida's new gridiron mentor, they both look "mighty good." Nineteen twenty-eight will be Jus Clemons' last year with the varsity, but it will be Ben's initial season up. Ben was a center last year and is a fullback of much ability also, but Coach Bachman's idea is to have the boys with the same name, but who spell that name differently, playing his leading tackle roles.

Pitchers Not Supposed to Hit Safely Anyhow

Back in the olden days, the outfielders possessed strong throwing arms. The story is told of a particular game between New York and Washington in 1898. George Van Haltren was playing center field for the Giants and Pitcher Cy Swain of Washington was at bat. The latter hit what appeared to be a sure single to center. Van Haltren made a mad dash and gathered the ball in on the second bound. Without stopping, he threw to first and beat the slow-footed Swain by quite a margin.

As Swain walked back to the bench, he naturally felt that the whole world was against him. He stopped to take a drink of water and one of the players yelled, "Oh, well, pitchers aren't supposed to hit safe anyhow."

Pugilist Monte Munn May Run for Congress

Monte Munn, who played football in the Nebraska line several years ago and then turned pugilist, is now in the Cornhusker state, having returned from a journey including South America and Europe, to conduct the state Hoover campaign.

When he is not immersed in politics, he will be found on the sidelines of the gridiron at Lincoln; for there is no more loyal supporter of the Nebraska outfit than he.

WHY

Keyboard of Typewriter Is So Arranged.

Explaining why the keys on the typewriter are placed as they are one typewriter company says: "The first commercially successful typewriter, which was placed on the market about fifty years ago, contained a keyboard almost identical with that used at the present time. The retention of this keyboard is undoubtedly due to the fact that hundreds of thousands of typists have learned it, so that it has become practically universal, and prejudice against a change causes manufacturers to continue arranging the letters in accordance with the desires of the majority of those who use it. When all is said and done, the present arrangement is a pretty good one. To attempt to make a radical scientific change would, in our opinion, not be feasible. J and K might be rearranged with advantage. We do not know why these particular letters were placed on the second row of keys. Certainly their position is not the best for a touch typist. However, touch typewriting was not known in the early days of the typewriter, so that the position of J and K was not so important at the time the order of letters was arranged. The reason for the present arrangement has never been satisfactorily explained so far as we know. We think the printers' case had something to do with the arrangement, and also that the arrangement was affected by the fact that the keys were in a circular basket and this arrangement to some extent prevented the keys from clashing. We think also that whoever arranged the letters had some thought for the sequence of the letters and tried, as far as possible, to harmonize the different points we have mentioned."

Why So Many Dislike to Walk Under Ladder

There is an old superstition, which is still quite common, that it is unlucky to walk under a ladder. How the belief originated is not known. A World-Famous Church

BEFORE there was a United States of America—Sieur de Bienville selected the site which was destined to become the present city of New Orleans. The rectangle was walled in, laid out and the central position (now known as Jackson square) reserved for a parade ground with a church at the rear.

A frame church, said to have been the first in Louisiana, erected here was destroyed by a tornado. It was replaced by a brick structure which was destroyed by fire. Then a wealthy Spanish nobleman built here the then—and still—great St. Louis cathedral, completed in 1794, which since has exercised a quieting and peaceful influence over the congested streets roundabout, and presented it to the parish.

This ancient and historic structure is surmounted by a tall, quaint tower which carries both clock and bells and is flanked on either side by a smaller tower. The interior houses some remarkable frescoes, done in 1792, and the archiepiscopal throne is adorned with the emblems of ecclesiastical origin—mitre, crozier and cross keys.

Probably the most notable event in the history of this venerable house of worship was the "Te Deum," held after the Battle of New Orleans, in 1815, on which occasion Gen. Andrew Jackson and his officers were present.

The body of the Spanish nobleman who made the church possible, together with those of a number of dignitaries of the church, are said to lie beneath the floor.

Representatives from practically every clime under the sun have trod the aisles of this noble edifice.

Short Lessons in Dairying

LESSON 56

PRODUCTION: A ration consisting of 10 pounds of hay, 30 pounds of silage and 8 pounds of grain, may be estimated as the required amount of feed to produce 1 pound of butterfat a day. The amount of feed a cow requires depends upon the amount of milk produced, the per cent of fat in the milk and the size or weight of the cow.

MANUFACTURING: For a co-operative creamery to pay the highest price for butterfat, it must have over 250,000 pounds a year—it must make high quality butter—and must have good business management. Every farmer in the neighborhood of a co-operative creamery should be a patron and a stockholder and work for the things that make the creamery pay.

MARKETING: When farmers got together in co-operative creameries they started to build effective marketing machinery. When the co-operative creameries started to get together they started to make their marketing machinery work.

Are You Ready

When your Children Cry for It

Baby has little upsets at times. All your care cannot prevent them. But you can be prepared. Then you can do what any experienced nurse would do—what most physicians would tell you to do—give a few drops of plain Castoria. No sooner done than Baby is soothed; relief is just a matter of moments. Yet you have eased your child without use of a single doubtful drug; Castoria is vegetable. So it's safe to use as often as an infant has any little pain you cannot pat away. And it's always ready for the crueler pangs of colic, or constipation or diarrhea; effective, too, for older children. Twenty-five million bottles were bought last year.

OLD FOLKS SAY DR. CALDWELL WAS RIGHT

The basis of treating sickness has not changed since Dr. Caldwell left Medical College in 1875, nor since he placed on the market the laxative prescription he had used in his practice.

He treated constipation, biliousness, headaches, mental depression, indigestion, sour stomach and other indispositions entirely by means of simple vegetable laxatives, herbs and roots. These are still the basis of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, a combination of senna and other mild herbs, with pepsin.

The simpler the remedy for constipation, the safer for the child and for you. And as you can get results in a mild and safe way by using Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, why take chances with strong drugs?

A bottle will last several months, and all can use it. It is pleasant to the taste, gentle in action, and free from narcotics. Elderly people find it ideal. All drug stores have the generous bottles, or write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. BB, Monticello, Illinois, for free trial bottle.

"Don't be silly," he answered her a little sharply, "you are the inspiration for the work. Since I found you again I've done better every day. I could afford now to take care of you in a fair degree of luxury, just on what I make myself without having recourse to dad's money, in fact, I've already begun to pay him back what I owe him. He knows all about you. I explained all about how what happened before was all my fault, and he didn't believe it at first, but he does now. How are you getting along, by the way, with your stories; are you selling them right along so that you have plenty of money—I've noticed that you looked a little peaked lately."

For a moment Lolita debated her answer to this question. She knew that she had but to intimate that she wanted a small loan—

"I'm getting along all right," she told him firmly; "working harder, that's all." Presently they came to a bench and sat down. For a short time they sat in complete silence. Lolita's thoughts drifted back to Elgin. She saw the lawn before the big watch factory where, as a little girl, she had played with other children who came at noon to bring their father's lunches. Lonesomeness lay upon her like a pall. Presently she felt Watterson's arm behind her along the top of the bench. His other arm crept along her forearm until it reached her hand. She turned and looked at him.

"I love you so," he said softly under his breath. There was infinite longing in his eyes. She made no effort to resist when he bent over and kissed her on the lips. Aching, herself, inside, for some one that she loved, she had not the heart to put him from her; she lay back, eyes closed, upon his shoulder as his kisses every few moments brushed her face.

"I suppose it's useless to ask you again today to marry me; but please let me see you every day. Even if you don't ever intend to marry me I love to be with you, it takes you away from that darned work of yours long enough to assure your getting a little healthy exercise and fresh air. You will see me, won't you?"

She opened her eyes and looked squarely into his. The expression there startled and frightened her, but it vanished almost instantly. It was as though, for a moment, the man that he had been had looked out through the eyes of the man that he was. She decided that it had just been a notion of her own and dismissed that thought instantly.

"Yes, I'll meet you at the old place, day after tomorrow, and we must go now. It's time for the second mail, and there may be something in it for me."

"You're sure you don't need any money?" he again asked as they rose.

"No," she told him firmly.

They walked to where he had parked his car. When he had driven away Lolita hurried home. Her first glance upon entering the house was at the halltree—but though there were additional pieces of mail there, showing that the postman had made his second call, there was nothing for her. She wanted to go to her room and work, but she dared not, since the landlady, hearing her typewriter would, in all probability, come and ask for the rent. She was a stickler for promptness in this connection. Going back to the street Lolita again walked toward the park, walked through it to the outer drive which ran along the shore of the lake, and started walking toward town. She had no very definite plan of action. Only grim determination possessed her; she would not give in to circumstance in any particular, come what might.

It was two-thirty, and time for the last mail of the day. She met the mailman and asked him if there were anything for her. There was not. Exhausted and weary she decided to go in and have it out with the landlady.

She walked through the house and out to the kitchen. The landlady, a bent and worn old lady of not more than thirty-six, old, somehow, in spite of the obvious fact of her few years, looked up from a dishpan full of dishes.

"That you, Miss Forbes?" she asked. "Been looking for you all day. Special came for you this morning, and I knew you were not up, so I signed for it; but when I went to your room you were gone. Didn't want to leave it on the hall rack, it looked important." She wiped her hands upon her apron and fished a long envelope out of some recess in her dress. With trembling fingers Lolita took the envelope and slit it open, remembering, as soon as she saw the name in the upper left hand corner, that she had asked the editor to send the check for the story by special delivery in case they bought it. Sure enough, there was a check for fifty dollars enclosed. It looked a hundred times better, huge and green, and signed by three names, than the first $350 check that she had gotten for her first story. She showed it to the woman.

"You couldn't take my rent out of it, could you, and give me the difference?"

The woman shuffled into the pantry, took down a crock marked "spice," extracted a small roll of bills and counted them. Finally Lolita paid two weeks in advance instead of one, since there was not enough money to cash the check otherwise.

With brief thanks to the landlady she turned and made for a restaurant. Fairly flying along she reached the place and entered. The waiter eyed the rather small and dainty looking girl with astonishment which he could hardly conceal at the order she gave him.

"A steak, a large one—medium. An order—an order, not a side dish, mind you—of lyonnaise potatoes. A plate of sliced cucumbers. Waldorf salad, with plenty of nuts. And, oh, yes, while I'm waiting for the steak, bring me a shrimp cocktail and some French bread and butter. And for desert a piece of coconut custard pie, and don't forget a pot of tea. Bring that right away, if you please." It seemed to Lolita that it was the most delicious meal she had ever eaten in her life. With every bite troubles, doubts, worries, fears dropped away from her. She saw herself in Warrill's arms. She saw long vistas of time marked and punctuated only with the receipt of increasingly large checks for stories. She saw paper-wagons with her name upon them, and the title of her serial "Temptation," below her name in smaller letters.

His Kisses Every Few Moments Brushed Her Face.

After dinner she walked gaily back, her head fairly seething with a new chapter for the serial, and a short story to be written before going to bed and gotten off immediately to the publishing company which, in the letter accompanying the check, had asked for more material.

At the corner of the street she stopped at the drug store and bought a package of cigarettes. On the way out the cover of the magazine containing Warrill's story caught her eye. It looked dreadfully interesting. She snatched it from the rack, threw a quarter down upon the counter and walked from the store, little knowing that under her arm, within the covers of the magazine was the story of Warrill's that would have made her so happy, had she read it, that her present happiness would have seemed like the deepest grief in comparison.

Back in her room she stood for a moment in the center of the floor thumbing through the magazine; however, before her eye caught Warrill's name, a perfect itch to be at the story she had thought of in the hotel dining room took hold of her. She threw the magazine down, snatched the cover from her typewriter and set to work furiously.

CHAPTER XI

The following morning Lolita still felt lucky and happy, but she decided that this time she would be more prudent than she had been after the arrival of the last check, for she had learned what every beginning author must, that checks for stories almost never come when needed and that the best time to look for them is when one doesn't care whether they come or not. Going to a neighborhood bank she opened a small savings account and decided to be most frugal with what money she did not deposit in the account.

Later on she went downtown to take back some books to the library and to get more. She had just finished Dresler's "The Genius," and been comforted by it, admitting, in all fairness, that if Dresler's picture of life in it was a true one, as she had every reason to believe it was, her own experiences in comparison had been like lying sprawled upon an Elinor Glynnish bed of roses, under a bright sun. James Branch Cabell's "Straws and Prayer Books," had begun to make her see her writing in a more serious light than ever before. She knew that her taste was considerably improving, and she was beginning to realize that she had as yet but scratched the surface, so far as her understanding of the true meaning of the verb "to write" was concerned. She could now dimly see long vistas of study yet to come that would stretch out to cover many years, a vista which had no conceivable ending. It was not like learning anything else, where eventually one came to the end of the necessary knowledge and then stopped learning; there was never any possible end to it. Bitterly she stopped to reflect that if Warrill and she could have worked together through the years . . . how beautiful that would have been!

When she had exchanged the books, she decided to get a bite to eat before going home, and, as a familiar tea room was not far away, she slipped in there. It was after twelve, and the place was jammed with young stenographers—as usual trying to look frightfully sophisticated—and young male clerks from near-by offices, endeavoring to look interestingly dangerous. It was somehow nice to be in the restaurant again, where she had luncheon so many times in those carefree days at the Emporium.

Suddenly Lolita saw a familiar form weaving its way through the tables and recognized the girl from the Emporium who, that fateful night in the dance hall, had told her for the first time how Harvey Torrence was making a fool of her. The girl saw her and came at once toward the table.

"Well, for crying out loud! Where did you come from?"

Lolita smiled up at her and indicated the empty chair at the table.

"Jeez!" went on the newcomer, "I'm glad to see you. I often ast Gertrude about you but she's got a mouth like a one-way pocket. How did you come out after your swell friend bumped Harvey Torrence off? Jeez, that was a good idea on his part, you should ought to of given him a lot of credit for it."

Lolita looked painfully about to see if anyone had heard. No one had, apparently; the other observed her look and lowered her voice.

"For cry-i, kid, tell me what you been doing ever since I seen you last?" Lolita thought for a moment.

"Oh, I've been working hard, and trying to be a very good girl in order to make up for having been a decidedly careless one."

"Ha!" exclaimed the other, without humor. "I tried that once. It's the bunk. It can't be done. When you're down, the parade runs over you—with spiked boots! No use pulling that stuff. What you want to do, kid, is get married. You're pretty enough to marry about four millionaires. Say! you'd knock a millionaire—use to seeing a lot of dried up society chickens—for a row of ash cans. Why don't you hang around the swell hotels and let one of them pick you up, and then say 'naughty, naughty' and run every time he makes love to you, until he gets crazy and marries you?"

"That's a thought," admitted Lolita, who did not like the girl, but who, after what she had been through, could withhold her sympathies from no one. "I had been thinking a little of getting married."

Executive Today Not Model of Aloofness

Mergers are many. One thing I've noticed, namely, that whenever there is an executive in one of the companies who has become favorably known to the public he is chosen as the active head of the combination. The old-fashioned type of ultra-dignified, aloof executive usually is shelved to make way for a man whose personality has favorably impressed itself upon the public. The frigid executive rarely is popular with the employees. He regards himself as the master and regards them as his servants. The more modern executive convinces his men that he regards himself simply as a coworker for the building up of the business along lines which will benefit them all. If you aspire to come out on top in this era of mergers, strive to earn the good will of employees and the public. Mix heart with head.—B. C. Forbes, in Forbes Magazine.

Do you have olfactory imagination? That is to say, do smells recapture scenes and experiences and moments of years ago? Acidity

The common cause of digestive difficulties is excess acid. Soda cannot alter this condition, and it burns the stomach. Something that will neutralize the acidity is the sensible thing to take. That is why physicians tell the public to use Phillips Milk of Magnesia.

One spoonful of this delightful preparation can neutralize many times its volume in acid. It acts instantly; relief is quick, and very apparent. All gas is dispelled; all sourness is soon gone; the whole system is sweetened. Do try this perfect anti-acid, and remember it is just as good for children, too, and pleasant for them to take.

Drink Water If Back or Kidneys Hurt

Begin Taking Salts If You Feel Backachy or Have Bladder Weakness

Too much rich food forms acids which excite and overwork the kidneys in their efforts to filter it from the system. Flush the kidneys occasionally to relieve them like you relieve the bowels, removing acids, waste and poison, else you may feel a dull misery in the kidney region, sharp pains in the back or sick headache, dizziness, the stomach sours, tongue is coated, and when the weather is bad you have rheumatic twinges. The urine is cloudy, full of sediment, the channels often get irritated, obliging one to get up two or three times during the night.

To help neutralize these irritating acids and flush off the body's urinous waste, begin drinking water. Also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any pharmacy, take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine and bladder disorders disappear.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help clean and stimulate sluggish kidneys and stop bladder irritation. Jad Salts is inexpensive and makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink which millions of men and women take now and then to help prevent serious kidney and bladder disorders. By all means, drink lots of good water every day.

The Good Samaritan figures in the 1929 "First Aid—Home Remedy Week" and is designated as the "First First Aid." This annual merchandising festival arrives with St. Patrick's Day, continues March 17-23 and marks the eighth anniversary of the plan dedicated to Drugdom by Sterling Products, Incorporated, in 1922 and immediately sponsored by the National Association of Retail Druggists. Seeing the great advertising and sales possibilities in the plan and its helpfulness to humanity, the National Wholesale Druggists' Association has swung behind it with the enthusiastic suggestion that druggists use local newspapers, and providing them with suggestive advertising copy tied to the National slogan, "Fill That Medicine Chest Now!"

Coming at a time when housewives are thinking of house cleaning, the command has added psychological sales value. Secretary S. C. Henry of the N. A. R. D., out of long experience says: "No one knows better than the average retail druggist how much needless suffering there is because most people are neglectful in the matter of making provision for the hour of need which is sure to come when sudden illness or unforeseen accident calls for immediate attention."

"Quick Relief Insurance" is the new definition of First Aid—Home Remedy Week's objective and is thus bringing the nation's "Health Service Stations" into closer every day life.

The Boss on the Scene

By H. LOUIS RAYBOLD

(Copyright.)

IN ALL his fifteen years of running a dude ranch Jim Stanley had never concerned himself over any of his guests beyond their actual welfare and entertainment until Daphne Fremont started in making miserable the life of Jim's nephew, Brent Burgess.

Brent was an intermittent cowpuncher who turned to in the summer time and helped his uncle pack outfits for the dude camping trips. A nice-looking boy, but tremendously bashful. "Woman shy," his uncle called him, and was glad of it. Nothing was worse in his opinion than a cowboy who fell heavily for casual summer flirtations.

Daphne, so far from flirting with Brent, seemed to have singled him out not exactly for ridicule, perhaps, but for a certain persistent teasing. And Jim had seen the lad flush rosily at some sally of hers or clench his fist while his eyes flashed.

Funny, too, for Daphne was a good sort even if somewhat over-indulged by her father, who had been a friend of Jim's for many years. Jim had welcomed the advent of this particular party, who proved to be a very decent crowd of young people with an older woman in the capacity of that old-fashioned creature, the chaperon.

It was to Mrs. Mortimer that he finally spoke about Brent.

"Miss Daphne rags him continually," he said. "The boy actually goes white when she appears. Have you noticed it?"

Mrs. Mortimer nodded.

"If it had been that fellow the boys call Redhead," ruminated Stanley, "I could understand it. There Miss Dahpne surely would have met her match."

"I would take Daphne to task," said Mrs. Mortimer thoughtfully, "but opposition of any sort has always acted as a spur rather than a check. I think that there must be something behind it all that we don't know."

Now had it not been for an episode the next morning of which Jim was an involuntary witness, he might have decided to let the matter run its course. Every summer had an end. In fact, he had rather come to the conclusion overnight that he was a sentimental old fool making mountains out of mole hills.

Shortly after breakfast he sauntered down towards the corral to see how the horses were bearing up under tenderfoot riders. Rounding the corner of the ice house, he came suddenly upon Brent and Daphne engaged in what was evidently a heated conversation.

Brent, standing stiffly, awkwardly, with his hands behind him, was unmistakably resenting whatever Daphne was saying.

"No Easterner would be so stupid!" was all Jim actually overheard for, as he appeared, both started and Brent, looking punished, turned away.

"Do you think, Miss Daphne," questioned Jim, quite as if unaware that he had interrupted a little drama, "that a three-days' trip to Lupin lake in the Pass sounds very interesting?"

"I sure do, Mr. Stanley," replied Daphne, with a similar effort to meet his casualness. "Everybody going?"

Three days with Redhead assigned as her guide, pondered Jim, would make her see the light. Would bring her to appreciate a fellow of Brent's caliber. The crimson-haired Jake Rogers was retained on the V Bar ranch for other sterling qualities than his abilities to esquire ladies. In a good mood, he did his clumsy best. In a bad one, he was as full of mischief as he could manage without being fired.

Brent he turned over to Daphne's cousin, a mildly pretty girl, incurably afraid of snakes, grades and thundershowers.

Evening of the second day of the expedition found the party camped under the pines beside lovely Lake Lupin. A semicircle of small peak tents was pitched around a central camp fire of mammoth logs. Horses and cook tent and quarters for the men were dimly distinguishable in the forest gloom at the rear.

Jim, wandering down to the fringe of sand at the lake's edge to smoke a cigar in the solitude he loved, was surprised to hear voices.

"Why did you plague me so, if you really cared, Daphne?"

"Because"—the voice was muffled as if it came from the depths of some one's shoulder—"you acted as if you loved me but would never believe I loved you. It made me so raging mad to have you sure I was only flirting!"

"How could I think otherwise? Not until today, when that fool Jake was careless enough to let you take that precipice on the outside, did I realize that I simply must take a chance on your allowing me to look out for you the rest of my life."

Jim drew back as softly as a deer. Daphne had made Brent suffer because she loved him. The way of a maid with a man! Well, the lad was every bit as well born as Daphne. He had had his four years at the university. As for money, whatever his uncle had would some day be his.

Just for the moment, however, up here in the cool mountains, with a young moon setting aslant the black lodge pole pines, the lap of water the only sound save for an occasional stirring of the night wind, money or birth or education seemed less important than lov

There isn't a mother living who won't agree that no half-sick child should be the subject for an experiment with medicines of uncertain merit. When your child is bilious, headachy, half-sick, feverish, restless, with coated tongue, bad breath, no appetite or energy, you know that nine times out of ten it's a sign his little stomach and bowels need purging. And when you know that for over fifty years leading physicians have endorsed one preparation for this condition, there doesn't seem to be any reason for "trying" things.

Rich, fruity California Fig Syrup clears the little stomach and bowels gently, harmlessly and in a hurry. It regulates the bowels, gives tone and strength to them and to the stomach; and helps to give your child new strength, energy and vitality. Thousands of Western mothers praise it. Mrs. Joseph W. Hill, 4306 Bedford Ave., Omaha, Nebraska, says: "I'll never forget the doctor who got me to give my baby boy, John, California Fig Syrup. Nothing else seemed to help his weak bowels. That was when he was just a baby. He suffered a good deal before I gave him Fig Syrup, but it stopped his trouble quick. I have used it with him for colds and little upset spells ever since. I consider him a Fig Syrup boy."

Insist on the genuine article. See that the carton bears the word "California." Over four million bottles used a year.

PROOF OF DYES is in the dyeing!

Words won't dye a dress, or coat, or sweater. It takes real anilines to do that. That's why Diamond Dyes contain from three to five times more anilines than any other dye—by actual test.

It's the anilines in Diamond Dyes that do the work; that give the colors such brilliance; such depth and permanence. It's real aniline that keeps them from giving things that re-dyed look; from spotting or streaking.

Next time you have dyeing to do—try Diamond Dyes. Then compare results. See how soft, bright, new-looking the colors are. Observe how they keep their brilliance through wear and washing. Your dealer will refund your money if you don't agree Diamond Dyes are better dyes.

The white package of Diamond Dyes is the original "all-purpose" dye for any and every kind of material. It will dye or tint silk, wool, cotton, linen, rayon or any mixture of materials. The blue package is a special dye, for silk or wool only. With it you can dye your valuable articles of silk or wool with results equal to the finest professional work. When you buy—remember this. The blue package dyes silk or wool only. The white package will dye every kind of goods, including silk and wool. Your dealer has both packages.

His Lucky Day

A lucky purchase was made by a man at a farm sale at Barnard castle, England. A buyer buying what was supposed to be a stone pig trough, he discovered on getting it home that it was a kirn of undoubted Roman origin, formerly used for the hand grinding of corn. It is probably fourteen hundred years old.

One Dollar Fifty Per Year In Advance

H. O. Hanson, Publisher. Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota; Friday, March 29, 1929. Volume 18; Number 48.

N. S. A. News

Eighty young men and women from every county in Northwestern Minnesota received their diplomas at a very impressive Commencement program held at the Northwest School of Agriculture this week. Of this number 57 completed the regular three-year courses in agriculture and home economics, while 23 finished the advanced course.

That the Northwest School of Agriculture has lived up to the highest expectations of its founders is indicated by the fact that over 80 percent of its 900 graduates have returned to the farm as farmers or home makers. Students entering school "farm minded" have left the institution with even greater confidence in and love for the farm as a home where they can live happily and rear sturdy resourceful children. In addition to the 900 graduates, other hundreds of students, who were in attendence one or more years, have established themselves as progressive and successful farmers and homemakers and are taking an active part in the social and economic life of the community.

The Graduates from Marshall County include the following: August Robert Thorkelson, from Gatzke; Sophia Elizabeth Hoper, Stephen, and Hilma Sophia Arlm of Argyle.

Let us see you at the school house at our next meeting.

Short Lessons in Dairying

LESSON 57

PRODUCTION: There are three factors in production—the feed—the cow—the care. We put feed first because without sufficient feed the best cow cannot do good work. Cows come next because poor cows will not give profitable returns no matter how well fed and cared for. A good caretaker is a happy man because good care denotes interest and joy in the work.

MANUFACTURING: The first requiremen in the manufacture of high quality dairy products is cleanliness, the second requirement is cleanliness, and the third is the same. A clean job of milking - a clean separator - clean utensils - these on the farm, and then everything just as clean in the creamery. Clean, in a dairy sence, means sterile - on the farm with washing powder, boiling water and sunlight - in the creamery washing powder, boiling water and steam.

MARKETING: Marketing between individuals where one produces to sell what another needs to buy, is a simple matter—it is a 50-50 break. This was the custom in early year. The farmer took a jar of butter to the man in town. Later, when the supply of butter exceeded the demand of the town people, the storekeeper bought it to sell in larger towns. Here a third party entered the transaction of marketing—the storekeeper. He set the price.

The Dean of Lighthouses

A RAY of light showing forth from a stone lighthouse at the entrance to Boston harbor on the night of September 17, 1716, marked the inauguration of lighthouse service in America.

Lighted by oil—fish or whale, rather than by candle, from the very beginning, in a wick lamp enclosed by thick panes of glass—this "Boston" light became the pride of New England when, in 1780, its power was increased to 16 lamps.

Originally, the keeper was paid $250 per annum. Funds for maintaining the light were obtained through the assessment of light dues against all passing vessels.

Life for this pioneer lighthouse has been far from "a bed of roses." Not only has it successfully withstood the actions of the elements—a 65-mile gale exerts a pressure of 10,000 pounds to the square inch and winds of even greater velocity happen along at times—but it also has hung up a rare war record. It was twice occupied by the British during the Revolutionary war. The Yankees burned all woodwork before permitting it to fall into the hands of the enemy, and the British rebuilt it, later blowing it up before letting it return to United States control. Its existence was again in jeopardy during the War of 1812.

Modernized after a fashion the present house is 89 feet tall—its walls almost 8 feet thick at the base. Now equipped with a 100,000 candle-power lamp, this pioneer beacon continues to perform faithful service seven nights a week the year round—its two-hundredth anniversary having been celebrated in Boston in September, 1916.

Of this light and the watchful and protective service it has rendered an exceptionally busy port, America can well and truthfully say, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

Volcanic Locations

Volcanoes generally are to be found along coasts and on islands, many of them forming islands themselves, such as Stromboli, off the coast of Italy. No active volcanoes are found in the interior of continents, those in California and Alaska, although somewhat removed from the coast, being considered as part of the coastal chain of mountains.

Put On 1929 Tags

Have you got your 1929 license plates on your car? A Highway bulletin reminds us that March 31st is the last day the 1928 tags may be used legally. We notice that a great many drivers still have the old plates on their cars. Many car owners lay their plates away when they get them and forget to put them on, but if they do not get them attached to the old bus before next Monday, some officer is liable to hang a red tag on their car.

Any car owner who forgot to apply for his license before Feb. 15, has several dollars penalty accrued by this time, and the longer he waits the more it will cost him.

Gospel Services

There will be Gospel services at the Community Hall at Holt Sunday evening, March 31st, at 8 o'clock. Special singing and Music cunducted by Evangelist B. C. Heinze and wife. You are all welcome.

Pastor's Easter Message

Dear Friends:

I greet you in the name of the Risen Christ. Sorrow and disappointment filled the hearts of the diciples when their Lord was crucified. Like a dark cloud that obscured the sun and left no promise of tomorrow, doubt filled them with bitterness. They laid Him in the tomb. With leaden feet they turned away to their homes.

On the morning of the third day there was great change. A strange rumor came from the garden, there was running to and fro. The Roman guards ran to the High Priest with the report of the appearance of an angel, the earthquake and the opened tomb. Mary came running, saying she had seen the Lord. John ran, Peter ran. The women running down the slopes shouted to one another, "The Lord is Risen!"

Death can no longer make us afraid. The opening of the tomb in Joseph's garden has sent a ray of light over the hills of time scattering the darkness of unbelief and illumination the way to the gates of God.

Yes, Christ is all He claimed to be. He is the Son of God with power. The Father has set His seal upon Him by raising Him from the dead. Hope comes and faith holds strange! "I know whom I have believed and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day."

What Will you do When your Children Cry for It

There is hardly a household that hasn't heard of Castoria! At least five million homes are never without it. If there are children in your family, there's almost daily need of its comfort. And any night may find you very thankful there's a bottle in the house. Just a few drops, and that colic or constipation is relieved; or diarrhea checked. A vegetable product; a baby remedy meant for young folks. Castoria is about the only thing you have ever heard doctors advise giving to infants. Stronger medicines are dangerous to a tiny baby, however harmless they may be to grown-ups. Good old Castoria! Remember the name, and remember to buy it. It may spare you a sleepless, anxious night. It is always ready, always safe to use; in emergencies, or for everyday ailments. Any hour of the day or night that Baby becomes fretful, or restless. Castoria was never more popular with mothers than it is today. Every druggist has it.

"Got a prospect?"

"Why, yes."

"Has he got the dough?"

"Well, yes, I believe he's very well fixed."

"Grab him, sister, grab him."

Lolita eyed her harum-scarum companion thoughtfully. They all seemed to have the same idea, and they had all had quite a good deal of experience with life.

"Do you think I ought to marry such a man, even though I do not and never could love him?"

"Love him! Hah! You make me sick. Love is the kind of anesthetic that gets you into the kind of scrapes you got into with Harvey Torrence. The best thing to do about a guy you fall in love with is never to speak to him again, once you find it out; because, pretty soon he'll find it out, and then, little sister, good night! When a fellah finds out you're in love with him, he declares an open season on you from that time on, whether you're married to him, or whether you ain't—it's h—ll. You couldn't want a finer break, from every standpoint, than a guy who wants to marry you, has dough, and who you don't give a d—n for."

"That's a very singular viewpoint," remarked Lolita, reflecting as she said the words that it really was not singular at all. Mrs. Hardy would have enthusiastically agreed with the girl; Gertrude had already so expressed herself. Her own experience would almost support the theory. Her father would doubtless think that the very best thing that she could possibly do would be to marry the first man who came along in order to make it easier to live down what had happened.

Was every one slightly cracked on the subject of love and marriage, she wondered, or was she unable to see the thing in the right light? Don had very decidedly disagreed with her upon the subject. She wished that there were some one to whom she could turn for real advice. Many of the good writers whom she was constantly reading—seemed to think that not only marriage, but love itself was a sort of delusion, based wholly upon physical stimulus, and not at all important in the general scheme of things.

Lolita rose. "Well, I've got to go, my dear; you may be right in all you say, but it is my contention that when a girl is down she need not be out any more than a man need be. Think about that some time." The other laughed a little too loudly, so that Lolita felt that the shot had struck home and might, perhaps, some day take root and grow.

Recalling that she had an appointment with Fred at one o'clock, she started toward her room.

Leaving the books at home, she walked on and met Fred.

"Let's just walk around a few minutes," he said; "I have a rather important favor to ask of you." They left his car, which was parked near the road, and started into the park.

"I want you to meet my father. He's very anxious to know you, and I promised him I'd bring you out tomorrow for luncheon in the house he's just finished. You'll come, won't you?" He was so anxious about it that she had not the heart to refuse. She nodded briefly.

"Yes, I'll come, but I hope you haven't given him to understand that—"

"I haven't given him to understand anything, except that I hope some day to win you, and that you are the most wonderful girl in the world—you'll really come then—you'll meet me tomorrow at ten and let me drive you out there?"

"Yes, I'll meet you at ten tomorrow and drive out with you."

Back in her room, later, she wished she hadn't promised to go; but it was too late to do anything about it now. Restlessly she picked up her copy of the Metropolitan Magazine to thumb its pages. Suddenly her eye lit upon the name Warrill. She straightened up in her chair, and started reading through the story.

Finishing the first brief reading she turned to the beginning and started to reread it more slowly.

It came over her gradually, while rereading the story, that she had deserted Don in his hour of need. It had not occurred to her before that he should have temporary weaknesses, just as she had had. He seemed so sure of himself, so knowing, so thoroughly founded and grounded in his habits of thought and action. What a little idiot she had been. She flew out into the hall to the telephone.

With her heart hammering she gave the number. Presently a girl's voice answered.

"Is Mr. Warrill in?" asked Lolita, controlling her voice with an effort.

"Yes, I believe he is. I'll ring his room. One moment, please." The "one moment" stretched out into a seeming eternity.

Then, "Hello!" came over the wire in that husky tone that she loved so well. Lolita started to return his hello. Her voice stuck in her throat. she sputtered helplessly.

Who is it? asked Don rather brusquely.

"It's me," she finally squeaked, "Lolita."

"Lolita! My dear! Where are you?" his voice was electric.

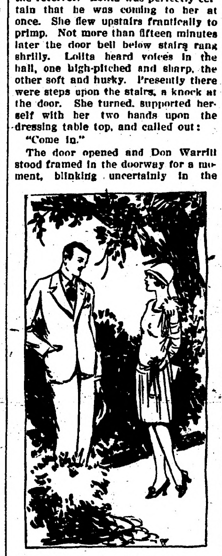
"I'm here—home—I—"

"What number?"

She told him the number and, without so much as a good-by he hung up the receiver. Lolita was perfectly certain that he was coming to her at once. She flew upstairs frantically to primp. Not more than fifteen minutes later the door bell below stairs rang shrilly. Lolita heard voices in the hall, one high-pitched and sharp, the other soft and husky. Presently there were steps upon the stairs, a knock at the door. She turned, supported herself with her two hands upon the dressing table top, and called out:

"Come in."

The door opened and Don Warrill stood framed in the doorway for a moment, blinking uncertainly in the gloom, for she had the shades down to keep out the sun. Seeing her he started forward, and, when he was half way across the room she found herself, though she was hardly conscious of having moved, in his arms.



"Yes, I'll Meet You at Ten Tomorrow and Drive Out With You."

"I've looked for you everywhere," he told her, his kisses covering her upturned face. "Why on earth didn't you let me know? What prompted you to call me now?"

"Your story," she faltered. "It was beautiful, I cried, when I read it." "Oh, Don, I'm so sorry—what a goose I've been—I saw it all when I read the story—to think that you needed me, and I failed you." He did not trouble to answer all this, but held her her at arm's length looking at her. Then, seemingly unconvinced that he really held Lolita in his arms, he strode to the windows and raised the shades. The sun streamed in. He put his hands upon her shoulders again, drew her to him, kissed her, then held her away.

"You're prettier, even, than before," he told her sincerely. "There's depth to your beauty now, something fine and new and wonderful. It seems almost unbelievable good fortune that I've found you again."

"But Miss Pringle—?"

"You read the story, didn't you?"

"You mean to say that—?"

"Absolutely. Everything has happened just as I told it in the story. Shortly after you disappeared I realized that I could never marry her, loving you as I did."

"But, dear, all of those things you said about art being paramount to the commonplace side of life, the—"

"The bunk," he said succinctly and kissed her full on the mouth. "The greatest art of all is life, and one can't play the game without observing some of the rules and not hurt themselves and others. I hurt myself, and I hurt you, and I'm through trying to play out of bounds. If you will honor me by consenting to become my wife?"

Lolita turned and looked up at him. It was, she decided, beyond all possibility of a doubt, the happiest moment of her life.

"Nothing could please me more," she said simply and felt a hot, happy tear run down her cheek. Don, too, was affected. For a moment he could not speak. He held her more tightly and stroked her hair with his hand.

"We'll be married tomorrow morning," he said firmly, unable to countenance the thought of delay.

"As you like," she agreed.

"My car is downstairs; have you had lunch yet?" She hadn't, and they started downstairs together.

They drove north, with no particular thought of hunger. Don not only found one arm sufficient for guiding the car, but found also creditable use for the other arm. It seemed to them both that they would like to drive on and on forever and never stop; but at length, they passed a pretty hotel half hidden by the woods.

"Looks good," suggested Warrill, "let's go in. He ordered dinner for two and they sat out on the wide, wind-swept veranda to eat. For a long period neither spoke. Warrill at last broke the silence:

"And how have you been getting along with your writing?"

"Wonderfully," she told him, watching the pleased delight come into his deep brown eyes. "So marvelously that it seems almost impossible. How can it be that I, who have been so undeserving, have had so much good fortune?"

"Undeserving?" he questioned; "how can you say that? You've been a perfect brick, from first to last. It is I who am the undeserving one."

"Your encouragement at the start was what did it, dear—"

"Don't be silly. You had it in you—that's all there is to it. But tell me every single solitary thing you've done, since last we saw each other."

Chronologically she related practically every incident, not omitting to tell him all about Fred Watterson and his rehabilitation.

It was dark when they returned, after having had supper in a roadside inn.

She stood upon the steps and watched as he drove off. When he turned at the corner he gave two farewell toots of the horn. Long after he had gone she stood watching the corner where he had turned. She felt almost sure as she slowly undressed for bed that the serial which she had sent off some days before would be accepted. It would enable them to start up their little studio apartment rather pretentiously. There would be nothing in it that was not beautiful, there would be nothing in their lives thenceforth which would not be beautiful, and perhaps, after a time—Lolita blushed. What a thought for a girl not yet a bride to entertain! Upon this reflection she fell asleep, awakening to find the sun streaming into the room.

It was close to nine o'clock. Hurriedly she sprang from bed. Memories of the night before came back in a rush and she stood for a moment in the middle of the floor breathless with delight. Today was the day! The thought of her appointment with Fred Watterson intruded and with a little moue of annoyance she began to dress, for there was no time to lose.

When she arrived at the customary meeting place . . . Fred was already there.

"You're late," he chided her, as though this fact had given him some unease.

"Sorry," she returned happily. They walked toward his car. Just as she was about to enter, Lolita caught sight of a familiar face a few feet away, peering around a hedge. As the car drove off she searched her mind to try to remember where she had seen the rather unlovely face before. Presently it came to her that it was one of the men who had driven her back home from the Goose and Gander roadhouse after her interview with Gray Eyes. This thought worried her for a time, but she dismissed it from her mind as trivial, a thing which she would, perhaps, not have done had she known that the man jumped into a black limousine that had its curtains drawn, immediately after she had climbed into Fred's car, and that the black limousine was at that very moment not a hundred feet behind them in the road.

Altogether Too Many Tenors on "Pay Roll"

An actor tells this one: "A good many years ago," he says, "a theatrical troupe left Chicago with just about enough money to reach the first stand on their route. After several nights' bad business they found themselves getting deeper in the hole and, being unable to pay the hotel bill, they took the landlord along with them, promising to settle when business picked up.

The company's manager discovered that the landlord sang tenor, and, being short of tenors, they had him singing in the chorus after a few days. Business still continued to be poor, and at the second stand they had to take that landlord along, too. He also sang tenor and was given a job in the chorus. The situation remained the same, and they were soon carrying eight landlords who sang tenor. Finally the manager became discouraged and wired his advance agent, 'Get a rate at a hotel where the landlord sings bass.' "—Washington Star.

Friend or Acquaintance?

No one has ever had too many friends; but one must not get into the easy habit of labeling every acquaintance a friend. The latter is a sacred word, not to be uttered lightly. Calling another at once by his first name does not automatically create an intimacy of spirit.—Charles Hanson Towne in Harper's Bazar.

You Get Strong, If You

Women by the thousands write letters like this:

"I sure do praise Dr. Pierce's Medicines. They have made me a strong and well woman. Before I took the 'Prescription' I would have fainting spells and everything would turn just black before me, but the 'Prescription' helped me a lot. I haven't had a fainting spell since." —Miss Veneta A. Jennings, Fort Ripley, Minn.

The use of "Favorite Prescription" has made many women happy by making them healthy. Get it from your druggist, liquid or tablets. Write Dr. Pierce's Invalids Hotel in Buffalo, N. Y., for free advice. Send 10c if you want a trial package of tablets.

Her Objection

"Why don't you encourage the attentions of Mr. Penniwise. He is very steady and economical?"

"His economy," answered Miss Cayenne, "is my objection. He is the kind of man who will order a $15 dinner and leave a 25-cent tip."

This Mother Had Problem

As a rule, milk is about the best food for children, but there are times when they are much better off without it. It should always be left off when children show by feverish, fretful or cross spells, by bad breath, coated tongue, sallow skin, indigestion, biliousness, etc., that their stomach and bowels are out of order.

In cases like this, California Fig Syrup never fails to work wonders, by the quick and gentle way it removes all the souring waste which is causing the trouble, regulates the stomach and bowels and gives these organs tone and strength so they continue to act normally of their own accord. Children love its rich, fruity flavor and it's purely vegetable and harmless, even for babies.

Millions of mothers have proved its merit and reliability in over 50 years of steadily increasing use. A Western mother, Mrs. May Snavely, Montrose, California, says: "My little girl, Edna's, tendency to constipation was a problem to me until I began giving her California Fig Syrup. It helped her right away and soon her stomach and bowels were acting perfectly. Since then I've never had to have any advice about her bowels. I have also used California Fig Syrup with my little boy, with equal success."

To be sure of getting the genuine, which physicians endorse, always ask for California Fig Syrup by the full name.

Heterogeneous

"I wonder what they make hash from?"

'Hash isn't made. It accumulates."

Makes Life Sweeter

When tongue or breath tells of acid condition—correct it with a spoonful of Phillips. Most men and women have been comforted by this universal sweetener—more mothers should invoke its aid for their children. It is a pleasant thing to take, yet neutralizes more acid than the harsher things too often employed for the purpose. No household should be without it.

Phillips is the genuine, prescriptional product physicians endorse for general use; the name is important. "Milk of Magnesia" has been the U. S. registered trade mark of the Charles H. Phillips Chemical Co. and its predecessor Charles H. Phillips since 1875.

Every year a huge army moves from farms to towns and cities, passing as it goes, another army about two-thirds as large moving to the farm from the cities, states the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. This shifting of population has been going on for a long time, although the movement from the farm was especially large in the four years from 1924 to 1927. In those years, an average of 2,027,000 persons annually left the farm for the city and 1,240,000 reached the farm from the city, according to estimates by the United States Department of Agriculture. In addition, an enormous movement of farmers from one farm to another or from one section of the country to another section occurs every year.

Those going to cities and towns may be divided into five principal groups, surveys by the Department of Agriculture have shown. Investigations covering limited numbers reveal that about 25 per cent are retired farmers, those who are unable to continue farm operations because of old age or physical disabilities, and the difficulty of obtaining adequate hired help. Nearly 40 per cent leave the farm for economic reasons. These include the young adults ready to start occupational careers, and older adults who are unable to make farming pay, or who believe they can do better in the city. Eleven per cent leave to give their children greater advantages in city schools. About 1.8 per cent leave in order to turn the farm over to sons or sons-in-law. A few, 2.5 per cent, leave because they have prospered enough to be able to leave the farm for an easier life and an opportunity to enjoy certain things they were unable to have on the farm. About one out of five leaves for reasons which are not readily classified.

The throng going to the farm from the city in most cases is returning to country life. About seven out of eight have had some farm experience and have found after personal experience with both farm and city life that they preferred the latter. They became disillusioned as to city opportunities and as to the pleasures in urban life. The great majority prefer farm work to city work. While somewhat harder, they consider it more healthful, and they prefer its independence, its closeness to nature. They consider its living conditions better for children. About half of these farmers reporting to the Department stated that they were making a better living on the farm than in the city. This was especially true of tenants. Some others had not been on the farm long enough to determine whether or not they would be able to make a better living than in town.

These figures suggest that about half of the farm folks who go to the cities decide later on to return to the farm, the Foundation points out. Presumably, many of these who went cityward in the last few years when the movement in that direction was especially large, will return later on. Successful adjustment to city occupations by mature persons trained entirely in farm work is not easily made.

The direct money cost of this moving about is enormous, to say nothing of the amount of lost time and efficiency involved. It also brings serious disturbances of family life.

Mistakes

All worry, of course, is useless, but if there is one kind that is more useless than another it is worry over mistakes that have been made and cannot be corrected. Once you have done something that can't be undone, the only normal thing is to check it off and think of it no more. When you have to answer for the mistake, meet the situation as best you can.—Grove Patterson, in The Mobile Register.

Mental pictures every car buyer should have

SOME DAY you will consider buying a new car.

Keep in mind these pictures made from photographs of scenes at General Motors' 1268-acre Proving Ground. A car wallowing in a sunken road with water over the hubs . . . a car bucking a long stretch of cruel bumps and pot-holes . . . a car straining to reach the top of a heart-breaking hill . . . a car doing twists and turns and other acrobatics that few cars are ever called upon to do.

Such are the tests given advance models of a General Motors car at the Proving Ground. The tests involve speed, power, endurance, braking, riding comfort, handling ease; fuel, oil and tire economy; body strength—every phase of car construction and performance. When every test has been met, the factory goes ahead and builds your car like these proved models.

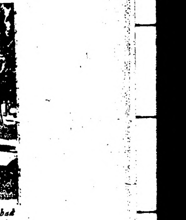
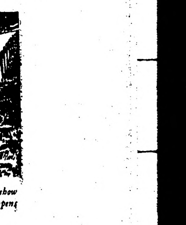
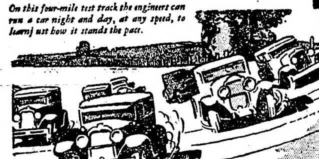
Keep these pictures in your mind. They will come in handy next time you are buying a car.



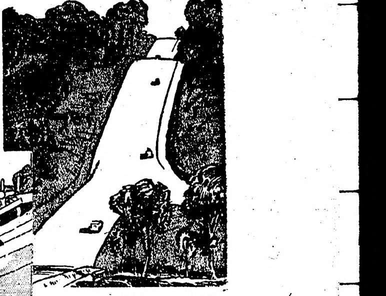
Rough going on a Proving Ground road, made bad to test various parts of General Motors cars under hardest possible conditions.



A scientific "bath tub"—not to wash cars, but to show the Proving Ground engineers exactly what happens when a car is driven through water.



On this four-mile test track the engineers can run a car night and day, at any speed, to learn just how it stands the pace.



Very seldom are hills as steep as this. The average grade of highway hills is seven per cent. This hill is 25 per cent and a car must be good to make it.

URGED TO WAR ON INSECT KINGDOM

Scientist Declares Titanic Struggle Impends.

Atlantic City.—The future will see a "titanic" struggle for existence waged between man and insects, members of the New Jersey Mosquito Extermination association were told by Dr. L. O. Howard, chief entomologist of the United States Department of Agriculture.

"Insects now consume each year the equivalent of the labor of a million men," Doctor Howard said. "They have a great advantage over human beings both anatomically and physically. Man's superior intelligence is all that has enabled him to even begin to check the advance of insects. A serious struggle is ahead.

"Rapidity of motion, and frequency of multiplication, quick adaptation to conditions, powers of concealment and no long period of helpless infancy, are some of the advantages that insects have over men."

As a means of preparing for the battle with insects, Doctor Howard suggests that colleges and universities devote more attention to entomology as a step in the mobilization of a trained army of insect fighters.

The importance of oiling small bodies of water and emptying casks and tin cans containing water was emphasized as a means of holding mosquitoes in check.

Noted Artist Spends Last Days in Seclusion

Gres-Sur-Loing, France.—Half paralyzed and almost blind, one of the acclaimed composers of the world, Frederic Delius, is spending the remaining days of his life in this tiny hamlet about 50 miles from Paris.

The man who imagined the music for "Koanga" and "Margot le Rouge" no longer writes music; his greatest effort is to shelter himself from the world. Each day his devoted wife reads him the French, German and English newspapers. Then, if the weather is good, to give him the benefit of the fresh air for an hour or so, he is pushed in a wheel chair to the river that flows at the foot of his garden.

Even the touch of his beloved piano is denied him, for his hands tremble so that they cannot find the keys. The recognition that has come to him of recent years is too late, for Delius cannot hear the plaudits that are accorded his compositions.

Boys Open Beauty Shop for Household Pets

Wapakoneta, Ohio.—There no longer is any excuse for bedraggled dogs in Wapakoneta since Fenton Hamilton and Charles Fleming, Jr., both thirteen, opened a dog beauty parlor. The boys are the operators.

Their parlor is in the basement of young Hamilton's home, and has been equipped with appliances to remove dirt, burrs and curl and comb long and short hair.

The youthful proprietors distributed circulars throughout the town announcing they were prepared to wash black-and-tan dogs for 20 cents, white ones for 35, mixed colors for "two bits" and curly haired dogs for 10 cents extra. They guaranteed to remove burrs, gum, or such other substances that might mar the beauty of their clients, and promise "kind treatment, no soap in the eyes, and face washed separately."

Austrian Diggers Find Gold Buried Long Ago

Vienna, Austria. — Gold believed buried 16 centuries ago by Roman legionnaires has been found in a field at Haffnerbach, near Vienna, during boring tests for water.

At a depth of 24 feet the diggers found rich deposits of gold dust mixed with clay and earth, several ounces of pure metal being obtained from every few handfuls of earth.

Mining experts believe Roman legionnaires originally took the gold from a near-by river and hid it in its present location for safekeeping during an attack from a migratory tribe. It is assumed the Romans intended to send their treasure to Rome to be minted, but probably suffered defeat and were forced to abandon their wealth.

Natives Hard Up

New York.—Native-born Americans are more in need of charity than any alien group, according to figures in the annual report of the charity organization society. Thirty-seven per cent of those aided by the society last year were born in the United States.

Takes Ores From Mud as Did Ancient Greeks

Miami, Okla.—A machine designed by W. A. Butchart of Joplin, Mo., is reclaiming millions of dollars in ore that formerly went into the waste piles. Twenty-five centuries ago Herodotus referred to the recovery of gold from the mud by means of feathers daubed with pitch.

Today oil and various chemical reagents are used to recover valuable zinc and lead ore from slimes, or mineralized mud, and from waste piles of tailings that at one time were considered virtually valueless.

ENGLISH ROBOTS TO ACT AS INFORMANTS

Will Be Placed in Stations and on Corners.

London.—Although England's first Robot was created only a few short months ago, he already has six brothers ranging in height from Jasper's six feet six, to little Rupert's five feet ten.

Despite their tender ages the services of all seven have been hired out under the contract-labor system during the schoolboy's exhibition at Horticultural hall, and soon after the exhibition closes the Robot family will be broken up and the brothers sent out to different railway stations and street corners to take 24-hour-a-day jobs answering questions and giving directions. A pathetic fate for such youngsters, that would seem to call for intervention on the part of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children!

Where Can I Eat?

How these dully gleaming giants of steel work has now been revealed for the first time in connection with the schoolboys' exhibit, where Rupert, a bright little fellow, is to be seen with his chest and head cut open and all his insides revealed. Young John Bull, Jr., presses a button on Rupert's tummy. Almost instantly lights stare from under Rupert's heavy eyebrows and a voice incredibly deep for such a youngster booms out: "What do you want to know?"

Young John, startled, stutters: "P-please, where can I get a bite to eat?"

"Take the third aisle on your left and walk straight on." booms the voice. Then the lights die out and Rupert is once again a senseless structure of cold steel.

Bewildered, young John follows the directions, and sure enough, walks straight into a restaurant.

Now what has happened is this: When the youth pushed the button on Rupert's tummy a light showed on a switchboard in front of a man at a table in a control room.

May Soon Be Common.

He immediately "plugged in" on Rupert, lighting up Rupert's eyes and establishing a telephonic contact with a microphone hidden behind a silver gauze-covered hole in Rupert's front. Thus the man at the central control station heard young John's question and he promptly answered back by telephone, his words being amplified by a loud speaker in Rupert's chest.

If the question asked is a "sticker," the man at the control station, and through him, Rupert says: "Wait a minute," and the right answer is looked up in handy reference books. One man in the central office, it is declared, will in this way be able to handle the questions asked of, say, a dozen or more Robots installed in a railway station, big shops, hotels, or even on street corners, and it is predicted that within the next few years these grim formidable Robot servants will be commonplace sights in all large cities.

Mexico Creates Zones for Indian Education

Mexico City.—An experimental zone, in which new policies of the department of public education will be tried out, has been established by the Mexican government in the states of Hidalgo and Tlaxacala. These sites were picked because of the large Indian population in their proximity, it was explained. The department is increasing its efforts to educate the Indians of the republic. Special schools in which new methods of teaching will be employed are being built in this zone. Cultural missions will also work there.

The establishment of this zone was decided upon at the suggestion of Moises Saenz, sub-secretary of the department. Senor Saenz has made an extensive study of methods for instructing the Indians.

Lightweight Kettles as Good as Heavy Ones

Pullman, Wash.—Heavy aluminum cooking utensils are shown to be no more efficient than less expensive lighter weight kettles, as the result of careful experiments by Catherine Landreth of Dunedin, New Zealand, research specialist in home economics now working at the University of Washington.

Miss Landreth has just embarked on a three to five year project to improve cooking methods for the housewife. She plans to investigate the practicality of the new method of electric cooking in which the current passes directly through the food and to establish definite standards for vegetable cooking.

Flees From Angry Wife Into Wild Beast's Cage

Los Angeles, Calif.—A wild animal cage was the refuge place of a circus man when his irate wife chased him about the "big top" with a horsewhip. This was the testimony of Alpheus G. Barnes Stonehouse, the "Al G. Barnes" of circus fame, in court here in connection with a suit for separate maintenance.

Stonehouse said he had divorced Sarah Jane Hardigan Stonehouse, his second wife, in Las Vegas, Nev., in 1923, and that she was not entitled to an allowance now. The woman claims that her husband was not a legal resident of Las Vegas and that the decree is void.

EAGLE TRAINED TO ACT AS RETRIEVER

Owner Demonstrates Bird's Rare Talents.

New York.—Capt. C. W. R. Knight of England recently demonstrated his trained golden eagle before an audience of about 20 bird enthusiasts on the estate of George Palmer Putnam on Long Island sound. Mr. Putnam explained that the flight was merely to give the bird exercise and that the bird enthusiasts, some of whom were members of the Explorers' club, had been given permission to view the eagle.

The eagle weighs about 16 pounds and has been trained to retrieve game and other objects thrown by Captain Knight. The eagle, which is being kept at the Bronx zoo, was brought to the Putnam estate in a closed car by Captain Knight and was kept blindfolded until ready for the "exercises." Captain Knight explained that he was better able to keep the bird under control when it was blindfolded.

As soon as the blind was removed from the bird's eyes the eagle perched on Captain Knight's shoulder. Captain Knight threw pieces of meat and dead rabbits as far as he could, and these were brought back to him by the eagle.

Among those who witnessed the flight was Capt. Bob Bartlett of the Morrissey, who took the Putnam expedition to the Arctic.

Grain Links History of Egypt, Abyssinia

Leningrad, U. S. S. R.—The hints of Herodotus that the ancient Egyptians and the Abyssians were somehow connected has been corroborated by botany.

According to investigations of the well-known Russian botanist, K. A. Flaxenburg, a striking likeness is now established between the old Egyptian emmer found in the sarcophagus of the priests of the twelfth dynasty and the Abyssinian samples collected by the Vavilov expedition in 1927. These Egyptian specimens differ strongly from other forms of emmer and especially from the Persian form in which some scientists found grain.

From Abyssinia the emmer is believed to have spread to Arabia, India and Egypt. In Persia forms arose which are allied to the Abyssinian ones. In Serbia other forms differentiated which approach the Abyssinian types. The Russian emmer originated from these Serbian forms.

Women Cured of Leprosy Stay on With Lepers

Carrville, La.—Because there is no one outside who cares for them two women pronounced cured of leprosy have chosen to spend the remainder of their lives in the United States leprosarium here.

One woman has spent 25 of her 70 years here and the other 14 of her 28. Both told authorities their relatives were unwilling for them to return home. "So, if you don't mind, we'll just stay here," they told Dr. O. E. Denney, chief physician in charge of the colony.

They are the first in the history of the leper colony ever to remain after they had been pronounced cured. Cure of the dread disease is rare. In the history of the colony only 40 persons have been pronounced cured, Doctor Denney said.

Turks Protect Allah From Public Insult

Kiazim Tevfik Bey, editor of Free Thought, was brought to court for publishing "An Open Letter to the Prophet Mohammed." One passage in the letter stated:

"To kiss the pages of the Koran, to sacrifice one's life and goods to visit a city hidden in Arabia (Mecca), is not this the worst sort of idolatry?"

A clause in the republic's newly adopted penal code subjects those who are found guilty of blaspheming any of the world's established religions, Christian, Moslem, Buddhist, et cetera, to heavy fines or imprisonment.

Real Stay-at-Home

Flagy, France.—That there is no place like home is the belief of Mme. Jeanne Lavigne, who will be one hundred and six years old next month. She says she has never been outside her native town.

Harem Customs Bring Argentine Protests

Beirut, Syria. — To protest against the attitude adopted by Syrian Moslems toward Argentine women, the Argentine government has closed its consulate in Beirut.

The consul stated that Argentine women of the Christian faith marrying Syrian Moslems abroad and later accompanying their husbands to Syria suffer considerable hardships. On arrival in Syria they are confined in harems as is customary with native women, and forced in every way to conform to the Moslem mode of life.

About Hundsditch

Hundsditch is a fine and well-known street of London but there is a strong sentiment for a change of the name. In the old days it followed the ditch that encircled the outer walls of the city, and an ancient historian remarked that the ditch was "a filthy place full of dead dogs."

Going Somewhere

Some one has said that it is hard to meet the average mind because it isn't going anywhere. The difference between real thinking and reverie is that reverie isn't going anywhere. Just letting things run through your mind, ungoverned, isn't thinking. Life is too short not to be going somewhere.—Exchange.

Dunstedter In New Role.

EDDIE DUNSTEDTER

Eddie Dunstedter, nationally known organist at the Minnesota Theatre, Minneapolis, and recording artist, appeared in the new role of Band Conductor last Tuesday evening, and on April 2 at 10:30 P. M. will appear in the second of a series of twenty radio broadcasts over WCCO, Minneapolis, in which the W. B. Foshay Co. of Minneapolis will present him and his twenty-one piece band. A national hook-up is planned after the concerts are well under way, probably about April 9 when the programs will be carried from coast to coast to reach all states and, it is hoped, all countries where W. B. Foshay Co. has public utility and industrial interests.

This is one of the largest bands in the United States to broadcast both symphonic and popular melodies and the largest in the midwest. The band includes a string section, brass section, woodwinds, and various specialty combinations which make it possible for them to interpret practically any type of music. Every number played is a special arrangement of Mr. Dunstedter's and he will be featured at the piano or on the organ each week.

The second of these programs will be on the air from 10:30 to 11:30 Tuesday evening, April 2. It is probable that the entire twenty concerts will be played between then and the early part of July, the band appearing two or three times a week during the latter part of the series.

For a number of years, Mr. Dunstedter has looked forward to directing such a band and with this opportunity he hopes to prove that he is as much a master at conducting as he is on the organ. His clever arrangement of classical and popular numbers places him in the forefront of American composers. Mr. Dunstedter is a master at symphonic arrangement, and outstanding in the country, ranking with Paul Whiteman. He is a popular Brunswick recording artist, and has a large following in both the Northwest and the entire United States.

The band, which has been rehearsing under Mr. Dunstedter's direction for several weeks, is declared by local musicians who have heard it, to be the finest group of its type ever presented over any radio station in the midwest, and equal if not superior to any being heard on the air today. The musicians in it are a group selected from the best in the Twin Cities.

A contest for naming the band will be announced during the first two concerts.

Short Lessons in Dairying

LESSON 58

PRODUCTION: Profit in dairying starts with proper feed—growing the proper feed—alfalfa hay, sweet clover pasture and corn silage. These are the champion feeds from the standpoint of profit. They are the best because they give most feed per acre, are the best kind of rough feeds for dairy production.

MANUFACTURING: When and where milk was first used and manufactured into butter has never been recorded Man learned dairying before he learned how write history: The dash churn, still to be found in pionier homes, is older than our history of agriculture. The manufacture of butter was perhaps one of the first household fine arts among the forefathers of animal industry.

MARKETING: When butter was sold direct from the producer to the consumer, the consumer said whether the butter was good or poor, according to his judgement. When the butter was sold at the local store, nothing was said about low grade for fear of giving offence and losing trade. For the same reason the same price was paid for all butter and the price was generally set at the price the poorest butter would bring on the market.

If Back Hurts Flush Kidneys

Drink Plenty of Water and Take Glass of Salts Before Breakfast Occasionally

When your kidneys hurt and your back feels sore, don't get scared and proceed to load your stomach with a lot of drugs that excite the kidneys and irritate the entire urinary tract. Keep your kidneys clean like you keep your bowels clean, by flushing them with a mild, harmless salts which helps to remove the body's urinous waste and stimulate them to their normal activity.

The function of the kidneys is to filter the blood. In 24 hours they strain from it 500 grains of acid and waste, so we can readily understand the vital importance of keeping the kidneys active.

Drink lots of good water—you can't drink too much; also get from any pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts. Take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast each morning for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help clean and stimulate clogged kidneys; also to neutralize the acids in the system so they are no longer a source of irritation, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive; cannot injure; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink which everyone should take now and then to help keep their kidneys clean and active. Try this; also keep up the water drinking, and no doubt you will wonder what became of your kidney trouble and backache.

Denver Mother Tells Story

Nature controls all the functions of our digestive organs except one. We have control over that, and it's the function that causes the most trouble.

See that your children form regular bowel habits, and at the first sign of bad breath, coated tongue, biliousness or constipation, give them a little California Fig Syrup. It regulates the bowels and stomach and gives these organs tone and strength so they continue to act as Nature intends them to. It helps build up and strengthen pale, listless, underweight children. Children love its rich, fruity taste and it's purely vegetable, so you can give it as often as your child's appetite lags or he seems feverish, cross or fretful.

Leading physicians have endorsed it for 50 years, and its overwhelming sales record of over four million bottles a year shows how mothers depend on it. A Western mother, Mrs. R. W. Stewart, 4112 Raritan St., Denver, Colorado, says: "Raymond was terribly pulled down by constipation. He got weak, fretful and cross, had no appetite or energy and food seemed to sour in his stomach. California Fig Syrup had him romping and playing again in just a few days, and soon he was back to normal weight, looking better than he had looked in months."

Protect your child from imitations of California Fig Syrup. The mark of the genuine is the word "California" on the carton.

Philadelphia, Pa.—"I always use Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound before and after childbirth. I am a mother of three children—two little girls and a baby boy. CHAPTER XII

—19—

Fred turned west. For a few moments they drove through the wealthy suburb with its neat lawns and hedges, imposing homes, and general air of fashionable snugness. Presently they came to the Ridge road. Lolita turned to her companion with a question:

"Where on earth are you going—we're clear out of town, are we not?" Stopping the car, he pointed far ahead to a new building.

"There it is," he told her briefly. There were no other houses near it. Lolita followed Fred into the house. She thought it strange that he opened the door with a pass key, but dismissed this thought with another one; that probably the servants had not yet been brought out from the Watterson home.

"Come upstairs," Fred directed, "and take off your things."

This request, too, struck Lolita as strange. There was an ominous brooding silence in the house broken only by the peals of thunder from without and the patter of rain, like shot, against the windows. Fred led the way upstairs.

There was a lovely bedroom suite in the room, all in glistening white, trimmed with tiny stripes of gold. She stood before the bed and removed her hat. As she laid it down, she happened to glance into the mirror upon the dressing table. Fred was locking the door, and watching her warily. Almost numb with fright she straightened up and faced him, trying to speak courageously:

"Why are you locking that door, Fred?"

"Rudy, had a line in 'The Sheik,' in answer to a question like that. It was: 'Are you not woman enough to know?'"

"You mean, then," said Lolita, sparring for time, "that your 'reform' has all been a sham?" He averted his eyes.

"No—it wasn't. It was on the level, and still is; but I've got to have you—I'm asking you, once more to marry me. My father isn't here, won't be here until tomorrow. There's no one here but you and I. There were one or two servants, but I've sent them away. I'm sorry, but I'm simply mad about you, Lolita! I've struggled against the desire to force you to marry me—this way—but it's no use. I'm weaker than I supposed. The thought of you torments me day and night. You're the only girl I ever wanted badly that I couldn't have."

Lolita's glance darted about the room. There was no other door, except one that led into what she could see was merely another smaller room, in connection with the bedroom. The windows, however, looked more propitious, it couldn't be much of a drop from them to the ground. She darted toward one, and flung herself against it, hoping that a catch would give way, but none did and, quick as a flash, he flew across the room to seize her in his arms.

"Fred!" she managed, though her breath whistled through her teeth so that her words were hardly intelligible—"don't! Hang on to yourself! You've been decent for so long. Win this battle with yourself and come out of it a man." For a moment he looked at her with an almost idiotic helplessness, slackening his hold. With a wrench she managed to throw him off and rush toward the door, but he had removed the key from the lock. Furiously she swung about upon him as he followed her.

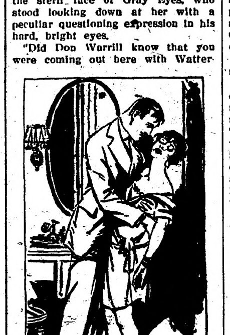
"You beast!" she said, placing both hands upon his chest and endeavoring to hold him from her, "don't you realize that you can be sent to jail for this sort of thing? Release me immediately. I'm through arguing with you—you're rotten throughout. Let me go now and I'll say nothing about it. If you don't I'll have you attended to the moment I do get out." He laughed and seemed to become every moment more like the man he had been the first time she had seen him.

This time all restraint seemed to leave him. He handled her brutally and though she fought him with every ounce of strength in her body she began to feel the futility of it. Her strength was no possible match for his, her muscles were almost limp. Noting her lack of resistance he picked her up bodily in his arms, but with one last vigorous writhe into which she threw all of the strength that she had left, she managed again to free herself and run across the room. Blindly she snatched up the little white and gold chair from before the dressing table. As he charged at her she brought it down upon his head.

Immediately there was a frightful quiet in the room. He lay stretched out before her, his forehead red with blood. Her body ached from the strenuous exertion of fighting him off. Her waist hung from her in tatters. There was a big rip in her skirt and one of her stockings had come down. Painfully, almost instinctively, she managed to get down the stairs after taking the key from his hip pocket. In an alcove near the front door she found a telephone. Without consciously realizing her actions she spoke the number into the transmitter. After a long wait the switchboard girl told her that Mr. Warrill was not there. Half fainting, but keeping herself conscious almost by sheer strength of will, she called the newspaper office. After a seemingly interminable wait came the soft, husky voice, like a voice from heaven. In gasps she blurted out what had happened. Mr. Warrill stopped only to ascertain the exact location of the house, assuring her he would be there as soon as his car could make it. After hanging up the receiver she sat for a time limply in the chair by the phone. Then, a new fear laying itself upon her heart, she went back upstairs.

Fred Watterson lay just as she had left him. His face was chalky white. In an agony of fear she went into the bathroom, filled a glass with water, snatched up a washcloth and came back to bathe his head. It seemed that she had been washing the cut on his forehead and holding back the blood for hours when suddenly she became aware that some one was standing over her. She looked up into the stern face of Gray Eyes, who stood looking down at her with a peculiar questioning expression in his hard, bright eyes.

"Did Don Warrill know that you were coming out here with Watterson?" he asked her, as soon as she looked up.



Her Strength Was No Possible Match for His Own.

"Yes," she answered, too worried and distrait to reflect upon the oddity of the question.

"You told him all about it, and he approved?"

"Yes," she answered again. This seemed for some reason greatly to please him. He turned and made a motion and Lolita saw two men who had been standing in a doorway come forward. They bent over Watterson and examined him briefly. One of them took a flask from his pocket and forced the contents liberally down the other's throat. Fred gasped and choked.

"Cut on the bean," announced one of the men shortly; "nothing to it." Both of the men stood up and looked at Gray Eyes; he, in turn, looked down at Fred as though he were about to kick him.

"I ought to kill you," Gray Eyes said in a level tone.

"Aw, I didn't know she was yours," objected Fred, in a voice so exactly like the one he had used in speaking to her in the Grantham apartments that Lolita started. With a last contemptuous look at Watterson, Gray Eyes grasped Lolita's arm and took her downstairs.

"How did you know I was in trouble again?" she asked after a moment, as he paused for something in the hall.

"Know, h—l! There hasn't been a moment since you left Mrs. Hardy's that I haven't had my eyes on you every minute; one of my men was always watching you. Several times I had a mind to step in and help you out, but I was kind of proud of the way you were making out all by yourself. It tickled me to see you actually writing stuff that was worth money to people who publish magazines. "Where's the telephone in this place?" Lolita pointed it out to him, and presently heard him talking to some doctor. "Only a flesh wound, no fracture, but you better come and cauterize it against infection." Just as Gray Eyes rejoined her in the hall the front door was shoved violently open and Don rushed through, a revolver in his hand, his face as white as had been that of the injured man upstairs. He stopped blankly upon seeing Gray Eyes with Lolita. For a full minute he stood blinking at them, and then, his face reddened and a bitter smile stole over his features.

"I guess you have a pretty capable protector," he said ironically. He turned, about to leave; at the door he swung about and observed: "I might have known Charlie would get here before I did—he's a fast worker."

"Wait a second," snapped Gray Eyes, but the door was banged shut. Lolita, too numb with misery to care much what went on, allowed herself to be led through the door to a waiting car. All of the way back she sat huddled up, too miserable to think. Several times Gray Eyes reached over to pat her shoulder, but he said nothing; he, too, was thinking.

At her home he assisted her from the car, took her to her room, withdrew and closed the door. Soon, however, he was back with the landlady. Lolita, sitting silently in a chair, saw that the woman was shoving a yellow-backed bill into a pocket in her apron.

"I don't want you to let her out of your sight one second until I come back," he said to the woman in that peremptory voice of his. She nodded and sat down in another chair. Again Gray Eyes went out and closed the door.

After a few moments the woman rose and crossed to Lolita's side.

"H—l, girlie," she said in a sad, discouraged voice; "whatever it is, don't take it so hard. Life is always like this, you just gotta get used to it." There was no response from Lolita, who still sat dry-eyed, stunned, feeling as though she were in the midst of some beautiful temple which for no apparent reason at all was crashing in ruins down upon her. In an effort to divert her mind the woman pointed to a package which lay upon the dresser.

"Something came for you while you was out," she said, hopefully. Lolita followed the woman's gaze to the bureau top. There lay the package that contained the serial—rejected, of course!

CHAPTER XIII

After a time Lolita rose from her chair to throw herself face downward upon the bed. Her slim body shook with the agony of the sobs that burst from her. Until she was empty of tears she cried, while the landlady, horrified at such grief, tried to reason with her, knowing nothing of her problem.

What cut Lolita most was to think that Warrill, having fought and won a battle with himself, with the thought of her aiding him to do it, should think, after all, that she was a superficial, disingenuous girl. Perhaps he would lapse back into his old way of looking at life; certain it was at any rate, that she would never see him again. Bitterly she resolved to give up—it was no use. Once one made a misplay in life the cards were forever stacked against one, but, astonishingly, she found that even in this, her darkest hour, the still small voice within her counseled fight and courage; the thought at last soothed her into a troubled sleep, and she drifted off on the reflection that she would not give up. She would fight on and upward, no matter how severe the battle might become. Surely, some day, some way, there would be an end to all her troubles, and some small reward for her courageousness in not having stayed down. When Lolita awoke it was dark in the room, and she found that the landlady, worn out by her vigil, inspired by Gray Eyes, had fallen asleep. She arose and turned on the light. Her whole body ached, and some scratches on her arms were smarting painfully. The landlady woke up with a start:

"Well, mercy me, what's happened?" she said sleepily.

"Plenty," observed Lolita bitterly.

"Come downstairs with me," suggested the woman, "and I'll get you something to eat; it's nearly eight o'clock," she added, glancing at the clock upon the bureau.

"I couldn't eat," Lolita told her. "I'd like to take a bath and get dressed up decently; these clothes are torn to pieces."

In the little room, with the door shut, she stripped off her torn garments and turned on the water. Her companion was spinning some long Odyssey of a misspent life which to Lolita was just a drone. Her own thoughts were so poignant, so colorful, that she could make no sense out of what the other said.

Matter of Accuracy of Greatest Import

I do not know that there is anything, except it be humility, which is so valuable as an incident of education as accuracy. And accuracy can be taught. Direct lies told to the world are as dust in the balance when weighed against the falsehoods of inaccuracy. These are the fatal things. And they are all-pervading. I scarcely care what is taught to the young if it will but implant in them the habit of accuracy.

Now, look at the matter in this light. Take the speech of any man for any given day. For once that he wilfully gives a wrong color (with an eye to his own interests) to anything which he states or narrates, he mistakes or misdescribes 20 times, on account of his inability to tell anything accurately.

Besides, there is this important result from a habit of accuracy, that it produces truthfulness even on those occasions where a man would be tempted to be untruthful. He gradually gets to love accuracy more even than his own interests; at last he has a passion for accuracy.—Arthur Helps

Mayas Retain Primal Charm

White Man Never Able to Convert Yucatan's Ancient Tribes.

Merida, Yucatan.—Life still has charm and romance in the land of the Mayas. There is much that has not changed since the days when Bishop Landa tried his hand at converting the Indians four centuries ago and complained that the Indians instead had converted Geronimo Aguilar, the first white man who lived among them. Geronimo, the bishop suspected, had become "as idolatrous as they."

Picturesqueness in the modern Maya village is not destroyed, as it so often is in the Mexican villages on the mainland, by dirt and misery, for the Yucatecan Indian is a luckier creature. He is cleaner, healthier and richer.

The town of Ticul, a dozen miles or so from the famous ruined city of Uxmal, is an interesting example of what has grown out of four centuries of European civilization implanted in the heart of the greatest prehistoric American civilization.

Native Blood Predominates.

Ticul was a growing town when the white man came, as the native will tell the visitor. Today nearly everyone who speaks Spanish speaks Maya, too, while a large proportion of the people speak the Indian language only. There is no pure-white blood left and native blood far predominates.

In the native sections of the town the Indians still live in their huts of sticks, adobe roofed with fan-palm, much as they did before the conquest. The most notable change is that they use the hammock, introduced from Santo Domingo, instead of the straw rug or "petate," which they used as a bed before, and hammock making has become a Yucatecan art.

Their huts are in gardens, fenced with limestone walls, rich with orange, banana, palm, papaya and sapote trees. Magenta-colored bougainvilleas and fire-red "flamboyans" add startling color to the picture.

Women Carry Burdens.

The handsome Indian or mestiza women, with spotless white cotton gowns, brilliantly embroidered at neck and hem, walk like barefoot queens through the stony streets, swinging jugs of water or naked babies on their hips. Statuesque women, with white-enameled washbasins full of beans or ground corn dough on their heads, stalk out of the spotless market with its crisp green piles of herbs and heaps of seeds and washed vegetables.

Maya potters still ply their ancient trade in Ticul, and the town supplies the surrounding region with earthenware dishes, pitchers and pots. The prehistoric disk or "kabal," which was on the verge of becoming a true potter's wheel, is still used. The potter sits on the dirt floor of his hut, turning the "kabal" with his toe and instep while he gouges out the wet mass of clay as it slowly turns and changes into graceful shapes under his strong fingers. Ticul yards are full of pleasant round shapes, drying in the sun, waiting for baking day, when they are burned in primitive ovens, such as were used before America was discovered.

World War Hero Dog Still Wire-Fence Shy

Ware, Mass.—Behind the bewhiskered, quizzical face of Captain, veteran war dog, lurk memories of ravaged battlefields that ten years of peace have apparently left untouched.

Cap, as his owner, Dennis F. Shea, state game warden, calls him, is a wire-haired griffon and a native of France. Cap is more than thirteen years old.

He escorts members of his family to store or church or theater—but does not enter. And he returns afterward to see them home. All this Cap has learned, but he has never learned to forget the war. The horror of barbed wire and gas masks is still upon him.

Although barbed wire is used hereabouts only to confine dairy cattle, Cap refuses to go near a wire fence. He still associates them with sudden death.

Sawdust as Fuel Gives Dealers Surprise Profits

Seattle, Wash.—Northwest lumber manufacturing towns formerly boasted "white elephants"—huge piles of sawdust, for which there was no demand. Last year some one invented a burner attachment that could be connected to any furnace, heater or engine and the use of sawdust was urged.

So many people installed sawdust burners that there now exists a famine of the fuel. All the mountainous piles about sawmills have disappeared, and to keep up with the demand for the cheap fuel, sawdust is being brought into the city by scows, auto trucks, trains and electric interurbans. Sawdust for Seattle use has been brought from mills 200 miles distant. There is no dearth of waste material from which to make sawdust or hogged fuel, but few mills are equipped with machinery to grind wood. Many dealers are realizing big and unexpected profits.

An abscess was removed from the lad's brain after physicians had testified that an abnormal brain condition was at least partially responsible for his criminal tendency.

41 STATES NOW HAVE LAWS CONTROLLING BILLBOARDS

Roadside Advertising Signs Regarded as Menace to Safe Auto Driving.

Washington, D. C.—Roadside advertising signs, considered by many as a menace to safe driving, now are controlled by law in forty-one states.

South Carolina, Arkansas, Texas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Kansas and Wyoming are the only states without state regulation of commercial signs and billboards.

Control in states is widely diversified, with some barring all signs from certain sections while others have wide limits within which the billboard operator and sign poster may function.

Connecticut, Massachusetts and Vermont have the most rigid laws. Before any agency can erect commercial advertising signs in these states it must be licensed by state authorities at a certain annual fee or furnish a bond if it is an out-of-state company.

Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, Nebraska, Nevada, North Carolina and Tennessee impose fees for advertising signs. Mississippi collects a fee of 75 cents for each sign from 10 to 100 square feet of area; $1.50 for an area between 100 and 300 square feet and $2.50 for an area of more than 300 square feet.

Tennessee forbids erection of signs upon the right of way of any state highway, and prohibits erection of signs resembling railroad crossing symbols on any public highway or street or on private property within one-quarter mile of the road.

In Florida the state road department prohibits advertising signs on state highways and imposes on agencies in the bill-posting business a certain tax on the basis of population in the cities and towns where they seek to operate.

Nebraska requires a state permit for advertising signs with a fee of 25 cents to $5 for each sign, and no sign may have more than ten square feet.

In nine states no advertising agency may erect or maintain upon any highway or right of way any commercial advertising sign. These states are Minnesota, Colorado, Maine, Iowa, North Dakota, West Virginia, South Dakota, New Hampshire and Illinois.

Fall Into Hot Water Causes Boy's Death

Chicago.—Max Rubin, ten years old, a school boy, died of scalds suffered when he slipped on a moist floor and fell into a bathtub of hot water in his home. The boy screamed as he fell and his mother, Mrs. Rebecca Rubin, rushed to his aid. Her hands were severely scalded before she could pull him from the water. Both were taken to Garfield Park hospital, where the boy died.

Tractor Battles Bull, Saves Farmer's Life

Marion, Ohio.—Clarence Perry of Marion is alive because Carl Lempke converted his tractor into a "tank" and plowed into a furious bull.

Perry was working in a field on a farm near here when he was attacked by a bull.

Unfastening the plow from the tractor, Lempke speeded the cumbersome machine across the fields and bucked the bull, which was compelled to flee from its helpless victim.

Perry received a broken nose, two broken ribs, and possible internal injuries.

HE STEPS OUT AT 82, LANDS IN JAIL

Celebrates After 13,000 Nights at Home.

Chicago.—For years William Kearns, hale and hearty at eighty-two, had avoided the pitfalls that yawn before men. In the 36 years of his married life he had not looked upon the wine when it was red, blue or yellow; nor had he gambled, nor stayed out nights.

A little quick arithmetic reveals that Mr. Kearns had remained at home something like 13,000 nights. A great deal of emotion may be pent in 36 years. Mr. Kearns, in the quiet of the county jail ruminated that after 13,000 nights of decorous deportment, a fellow becomes a wee bit bored.

One night Mr. Kearns, eighty-two, but feeling quite chipper, decided to step out with the boys. Then, if ever, he reasoned, was the time to sow his wild oats.

After a goodly crop had been sown, he went home, where his wife, who is eighty years old, had been wondering what had happened. Though it was "way past bedtime," Kearns began moving the furniture into the alley. He amused himself between times by tossing bric-a-brac at such targets as attracted his playful fancy. Mostly he aimed at the garage. Mrs. Kearns finally called the police.

Her husband was still in a happy frame of mind when he went before Judge Hartigan.

"Thirty days," the court said.

"Thanks, judge," said Mr. Kearns. "What's 30 days compared to 36 years?"

"Well, make it 60 days then," said the court.

"That's fine," replied Kearns, "and again I thank you."

"You're welcome, and I'll make it 90 days," Judge Hartigan told him.

Families Exchange Mates and Children

Minot, N. D.—An exchange of husbands, wives and even children by two families living on farms near Lansford, Bottineau county, was revealed here by divorce records in the case.

Mrs. Lawrence C. Rikenarud and Mrs. Willis Knight obtained divorces here on the same day, each charging her husband with infidelity. Each wife testified for the other and the husbands made no answer to the complaints.

Testimony in Mrs. Rikenarud's suit hinted at a quarrel at the Knight family home before the suits were filed. During the quarrel, it was said, certain admissions were made.

Then, with the divorce decrees issued, Mrs. Rikenarud and Knight decided to get married. Mrs. Knight and Rikenarud had the same idea. So the four slipped across the boundary line to Melita, Manitoba, where a double wedding ceremony was performed.

Afterward, to prove there was no animosity, the four made the trip back to their farms, about a mile and a half apart, in the same automobile.

There are five children in the Knight family, the oldest of whom is thirteen, and two in the Rikenarud family, a boy and a girl. In each case the mother was granted custody of the children and removed them from one farm to the other, with the exception of the oldest Knight boy, who stayed with his father.

Villagers Barricade Selves Against Wolves

Bratislavia, Czechoslovakia.—Forced from their native lairs by extremely heavy snow, wolves continue their depradations in the rural sections and small towns, attacking both humans and animals. Reports from Galanta, near here, say villagers have had to barricade themselves in their homes in order to keep from being attacked. A nineteen-year-old boy was torn to pieces by a pack after he had exhausted himself in flight and used the last cartridge in his pistol. A woman also was killed and several persons badly mutilated.

Horton, the Matchmaker

By EDGAR T. MONFORT

(Copyright.)

OLD man Horton's eyes narrowed as he stood at the window and watched Harold Banks and Lucy Forester slowly approaching the big office building. He saw Banks smile down at the girl as he took her arm and helped her across the street. At the curb they stopped a moment while Banks took two or three puffs at his cigarette, then tossed it away preparatory to entering the Horton building where no smoking was allowed. Then as they started on again Banks said something to Lucy and she looked up quickly and laughed, the merriest little laugh.

"So that's the way it goes," he thought. "Banks is daffy about her, but he shan't have her. I've got first rights. She's young and she's pretty and she's sweet, and even if I'm not so all fired young I've got the dough and she's struggled to make a living long enough to know how to appreciate it. Banks won't have a chance once I let her know my intentions. Any stenographer would jump at the chance of being Mrs. James Horton."

He leaned back complacently and eyed the young girl as she busied herself with her typewriter after she came into his room.

But then she was young and Banks was darned attractive, he reasoned further. Perhaps there was some danger. Should he propose to Lucy right away? No, he vetoed that idea immediately, for instinct told him that, as he had not yet shown her any personal attention, he would have to wait and let things develop a bit further. Should he dismiss her so as to get her away from Banks? Propinquity was a dangerous thing. But in that case he would be sending her away from himself, too, and killing the opportunity of letting propinquity help her in his own case. Should he dismiss Banks? That would be difficult because Horton's partner might kick and ask for a reason. Banks was a very valuable man. If he could only get rid of him without causing comment. But how?

After an hour of useless thinking only one thing remained clear in his mind: the two had to be separated at once. He wasn't going to have an underling cutting him out; nobody had ever beaten Horton yet and he didn't intend to be conquered this time. He felt certain of one thing: even under the circumstances there was very little danger of Lucy's refusing the hand of James Horton, but there would be absolutely none, provided there were no one else in the field.

Then out of nowhere an idea came tumbling into Horton's mind that almost made him jump up and down for sheer relief and joy. And at the directors' meeting that very afternoon he laid his first plans.

"Gentlemen," he said sententiously, "I've been thinking a lot about young Banks lately. He's a darn capable fellow. Why not send him out to South America to open our new branch? He's been right with me for three years and knows the business from A to Z. We might send him down right away to get the lay of the land and rent a site."

The idea was discussed and finally adopted. The next morning Horton called Banks into his inner office and made him the offer which included a raise almost beyond belief.

"You'll have to give me your answer tomorrow morning and be prepared to leave on the midnight train," Horton answered, turning back to his desk. "Think it over."

"I surely appreciate the opportunity, Mr. Horton," Banks said warmly, gripping the older man's hand, "and I think it'll be all right, but of course I'd like to speak to my mother about it first."

Then as Banks walked back to his desk it struck him like a blow that it would mean leaving Lucy and that he simply could not bear to do. Never before had he associated himself with her in that way. She was just always there when he wanted to look at her. She was always willing to let him come over in the evening when he wanted to talk and get some sympathy. Always on tap—that's what she was—and until the prospect of leaving her had come to him, he had never fully realized just how much she meant to him.

No, he couldn't get along without Lucy; then something dawned on him with a suddenness that was like an electric shock and sent little thrills of excitement tingling through his body. Why not marry her and take her along? If only she were willing. But he hadn't prepared the ground. How could a man make love, propose and get married all within twenty-four hours? It simply wasn't done. But he was so enthusiastic about the idea that he made a date with Lucy for that evening and put the whole situation before her.

"It's up to you, dear, I've got my chance of promotion but I'm hanged if I'll go without you. Now, you can make me or break me."

"I believe I'll—make you," she laughed happily as Harold caught her in his arms and kissed her smiling lips.

The next morning in an outburst of joy Harold accepted the offer and told his boss of the approaching wedding and after he had left the office all Horton could say was:

"And me the match maker! Well, I'll be darned!"

Higher Prices Avoided

THE average cost of living has increased approximately fifty per cent since 1914. But in only a few tows are electric rates higher than in 1914 and in most towns they have actually been reduced.

Only by building many miles of transmission lines and closing down small isolated plants have the electric companies been able to furnish service at pre-war prices.

Dairymen's Honors

The following names are of the leading dairymen of this community who have delivered 2000 pounds or more of butterfat to the local creamery during 1928.

Name	Lbs
Arno Steinhauer	5044
F. D. Voth	3654
C. A. Davis	3612

Wm. Mehrkens	2570
Alf Larson	2551
M. J. Lunke	2471
Alf. Movick	2287

Mrs. M. S. Sampson	2250
Herman Peterson	2239
Frank Horien	2133
Knute Nelson	2082
Iver Borsheim	2056
McMurray Bros.,	2020

In looking over the yearly list for 1927 we find the same four patrons are at the top of the list for this year but, they have done some changing around. Mr. Steinhauer has quite increase in his cream deliveries over that of 1927, as that year he had 4172 pounds as compared with 5044 pounds this year. Augustine was second last year and Voth was fourth on the list. Davis holds his old position as the 3rd ranking dairyman in this community with a gain of almost 500 pounds of cream delivered in 1928 over that in 1927.

Some of those rating in the 2000 pound class in 1927 have dropped below that mark for the 1928 season and, other dairymen who are up and coming have taken their places. There is only one less in the 2000 pound rank this year, there being 19 now as compared with 20 for 1927.

The Last Command

What is believed to be one of the most powerful dramas ever enacted on the American screen will be at the Holt Community hall, next Tuesday, April 16.

It is The last Command, starring the international and incomparable actor, Emil Jennings.

"The Last Command" is a worthy successor to Jenning's two previous production in which he appeared before the American public in "Variety" and "The Way Of All Flesh."

Jennings does an unbelievably splendid characterization of a Russian general and is then torn from his riches and might by the revolutionists.

To make the presentation of this picture complete a 4 piece orchestra has been secured to furnish the classical music that is required for it.

The people of Holt and vicinity may look forward for a real good evening's entertainment. The show will start at 8 o'clock sharp.

Cow Sold For $500

What is believed to be the highest price paid for livestock in this community for some time was paid to Fred Voth of Holt for a pure-bred Holstein cow last week by the Lilac Hedge Farm of Grand Forks, which is owned by J. D. Bacon, proprietor of the Grand Forks Herald and the Dakotah Hotel. Ed. Johnson, manager of the farm, paid $500 for Ormsby Pieterje Bes De Kol, a six year old. Voth who milks about fifteen cows, also sold one to the Bacon farm last year.

Martha Washington's Rose Garden

THE rose garden which was set out along about 1759 on the country estate of the Father of his Country at Mount Vernon, Va., is said to have been the first formal garden in America.

This picturesque and quaint old garden, maintained today practically as the Washington family left it, with its wealth of bloom and delightful odors—pinks, sweet William, roses, heliotropes, verbenas, dahlias, hydrangeas and chrysanthemums—and its atmosphere of quiet peacefulness constitutes one of the memories of rare charm of Mount Vernon to visitors from far and near.

The maze of flower beds—circular, triangular, oblong and square, are laid out in careful precision and the old-fashioned box hedges which line its walks are smooth-cut on top, their sides trimmed straight and exact. The protecting wall was made of brick which probably were brought from England and held together with oyster-shell cement.

It is said that the four great trees which guard one entrance were planted by Washington with his own hands and that in 1824 the gallant Lafayette planted here, in memory of his friend, a sprig taken from the grave of the great Napoleon at St. Helena.

Features which attract marked attention are the Nellie Custis rose, white as the driven snow, which Washington named in her honor—oft referred to as the lovers' rosebud, where the prince and princess of Rumania, as well as thousands of other less-world-known boys and girls and men and women have come to make their fondest wish—and a sea-shell pink rose—the Mary Washington—which he named for his devoted mother.

Short Lessons in Dairying
LESSON 58

PRODUCTION: Profit in dairying starts with proper feed—growing the proper feed—alfalfa hay, sweet clover pasture and corn silage. These are the champion feeds from the standpoint of profit. They are the best because they give most feed per acre, are the best kind of rough feeds for dairy production.

MANUFACTURING: When and where milk was first used and manufactured into butter has never been recorded Man learned dairying before he learned how write history: The dash churn, still to be found in pionier homes, is older than our history of agriculture. The manufacture of butter was perhaps one of the first household fine arts among the forefathers of animal industry.

MARKETING: When butter was sold direct from the producer to the consumer, the consumer said whether the butter was good or poor, according to his judgement. When the butter was sold at the local store, nothing was said about low grade for fear of giving offence and losing trade. For the same reason the same price was paid for all butter and the price was generally set at the price the poorest butter would bring on the market.

The Girl Who Came Back

Later, stepping out of the bath, she rubbed down briskly, and, clad only in her bathrobe, went back to her room, the landlady following her. Determining to spend the night in either writing or reading, in order to staunch what seemed like a literal flow of blood from her heart, she dressed fully and carefully. But when she had fully dressed she could not read. She opened a book and for diversion started to read it aloud to the other—with the result that the landlady went immediately to sleep again, to awake instantly when there was a peal at the front door bell below stairs.

Lolita paid no attention as the woman rushed from the room, and she still ignored the sounds of several people entering downstairs until suddenly, as they ascended, a husky laugh galvanized her into almost painful attention.

Presently there was a knock at the door.

It seemed to Lolita that her knees had turned to water. She supported herself with one hand upon the bureau as she managed to squeeze out a squeaky:

"Come in."

The door opened.

A solemn-looking individual whom she had never seen before strode through, immediately followed by a man and a woman whom she did not recognize; then Gray Eyes followed them, and after him an apparition which sent her flying across the room to bury her head in a familiar old gray sack suit soaked with tobacco fumes.

"Father," she managed to get out, and then she buried her head on his shoulder, afraid to look up at his face for fear of seeing disapproval there.

"You'll forgive me and take me back, won't you, dad? I promise to be ever so good! I'm so sorry about what happened."

Suddenly a misty form resolved itself before her eyes. At first she thought that it was merely an illusion, but as her eyes cleared of tears she saw that it was no illusion. It was Don, in the flesh, and looking like a small boy at a funeral. He smiled relievedly as she looked at him, as though her notice had marked him as one who had some right to be present. She rose and walked over to him.

"Don," she began, "won't you let me explain—"

"No," he said almost roughly, "not what you're thinking about explaining, but if you can explain to me how you manage to have any patience with a cad who jumps to conclusions like a schoolboy and runs at in a huff, without an ounce of faith, from the most wonderful girl in the world, whenever it appears that she needs him most—"

"Oh, Don; there's nothing to explain about that—who could blame you? I seem to have a perfect genius for getting into ridiculous situations, but I do love you, even if I do get into all sorts of crazy fixes. You'll believe that, won't you?" He looked like a man who fully believed. The room was literally crowded. The strangers, one of whom Lolita now saw was in clerical garb, stood about uncertainly, the landlady stood in the door wide-eyed. Gray Eyes, apparently coming out of a reverie, if one could only conjecture what thoughts, motioned to the minister. He came across the room and stood before Don and Lolita, quietly opening his Bible. It all seemed like a dream to the girl as the closing words of the ceremony were spoken and Don kissed her for the first time as her husband. She was too happy to ask questions, contenting herself merely with answering one enthusiastically.

When it was all over, the two other strangers signed a paper and Gray Eyes gave them each a bill. They left the room, and closed the door, leaving Lolita, Gray Eyes, her father, and Don alone together.

It was Lolita's father who first broke the silence.

"I'm no end glad to see you married, Lolita; you need a husband, Lord knows, with such a stubborn old bigot for a father. I'm ashamed of having acted toward you as I have, especially since Charlie here told me of your brave fight all alone, after your trouble. I'm ashamed of the way I've acted toward Charlie all of these years. I was brought up in an age when damnation was automatically supposed to follow a wrong action, when gambling and all gamblers were considered emissaries of hell. I still don't approve of gambling, and that sort of thing, but God only knows where you'd have been by this time if it hadn't been for Charlie here, my brother. You never heard him mentioned at home, another one of my stubbornnesses. I'm downright ashamed after the way he's acted."

"Well, I suppose a pair of old bucks like ourselves are entirely out of place here right now," remarked Gray Eyes with forced gayety. "Could you kids possibly excuse us; we want to talk over some plans. I'm giving up all of my connections in Chicago. Your dad and I have in mind a farm proposition, on a large scale, down near Elgin." He did not wait for an answer but walked toward the door, his arm about Lolita's father's shoulders; they passed through the door and closed it.

"I never knew him by any name but 'Charlie,'" explained Don; "nobody ever called him anything else. Can you forgive me for having doubted you?"

For answer she snuggled into the circle of his arms and raised her head, for what purpose Don was not long in discovering.

"We've still got time to catch the Century for New York, for a honeymoon among all of the people you and I have been selling, or trying to sell stories to, for so long. It's a great town for a honeymoon. Can't you just throw some things into a satchel and come. I want to get you a whole new outfit, anyway, in New York. I don't want you to have anything you can possibly get rid of to remind you of all the things you've been through."

"I can do it," she agreed, and flew about the room, gathering up things.

Her eye lit upon the package on the bureau and she tore herself from her husband's arms to run back a moment.

"Might be some sort of a letter or something in it," she pleaded. "I'd think about it all the time we were gone if I don't see."

"Oh, Don, There's Nothing to Explain About That."

Torn open, the package proved indeed to be her returned story. On top of it was a typewritten letter. She glanced through it, then read it again aloud:

"Dear Miss Forbes:

This is a tremendous piece of work. We are pleased to accept it. We wish to start it running in the paper in not less than two months. We are returning it so that you may write subcaptions and chapter headings for the chapters we have marked. When this is done, return the manuscript and we will forward our check."

For a moment Lolita stood by the bureau literally petrified. To think that her message would now go to thousands of girls throughout the city, perhaps be published in book form later, perhaps even in motion pictures—the vital and true message that a girl, exactly like a man, may be down, but never out. The thought was transporting. Don, watching her face, realized that he had only begun to know her beauty. He opened his arms, and she ran to them with a happy cry.

(THE END)

"Carried Out" Loads, According to Order

Not so many years ago a mining engineer was sent to the interior of Mexico to speed up work on a silver mine.

He found primitive means of moving ore and sent in a hurry call for several hundred wheelbarrows. They arrived and were eyed with a little distrust by the miners until the senor took one by the handles—followed by the mine foreman with another—and wheeled it into the mine. Whereupon the others followed.

Once inside, they were shown how to fill the barrows. Several carried out these instructions to the letter, until they had learned the art sufficiently to be left to their own devices.

Some time later the engineer and the foreman returned, expecting to see great progress. Instead, they found the men cheerily wheeling their barrows into the mine and filling them with ore. Then it required three or four men to carry the load out; two shouldering a handle each and the other bearing the rest of the weight.

They had not been taught to wheel out the loaded barrows; merely to wheel them in—and had been told to carry the ore out!—Nation's Business.

Annual Auction of Dogs in Virginia Town

Mystery Murders Puzzle the Police

Two Women Victims of Similar Crime a Year Apart in New Jersey.

New York.—No two crimes in recent years offer so many grounds for comparison as the murder and attempted burning by gasoline of Margaret Brown on the night of February 20, 1928, on Bernardsville road between Somerville and Morristown, N. J., and the murder and attempted burning by gasoline of an unknown woman found recently nearby.

The murders have some marks of similarity, but there are striking dissimilarities.

Outstanding among the differences between the two murders and gasoline burnings is this:

Miss Brown was not dead when found. She was alive and moaning, when found near midnight behind what in summer was used as a refreshment stand at a picnic ground or small resort. She died the next day.

The Great Difference.

The unknown woman found a year later was shot through the top of the head.

Here is the great difference between two murders in respect to the burning:

Whoever killed Miss Brown poured gasoline over the lower part of her body and lighted the gasoline from the feet. She was found so quickly that her face and bust were as yet not disfigured by the flames, and her face was recognizable.

Whoever killed the unknown woman covered her with gasoline and fired the gasoline from the upper part of the body, with the result that the face was so badly disfigured that at this writing her identity has not been established.

The fact that Miss Brown had been burned from the feet seemed to establish incontestably that the murderer was an amateur, who had probably attacked in anger, or as the result of sex passion, and either acted with extreme haste in firing the still living woman after he had dragged her from the motor car and poured gasoline from the tank over the victim, or that he was horrified at the thought of being an actual witness of the flames destroying her features.

That the murderer was an amateur was proved when the papers of February 23, 1928, reported that the police of Bernardsville had received a letter containing a $500 note and a package of bonds worth $2,500 along with what purported to be a confession of Miss Brown's killer.

He said he had met her in Buffalo and later while she was acting as governess in New York; that he had taken her riding on February 20, when she had drawn her money and bonds preparatory to going out West to join relatives; that he had tried to take advantage of her and when she resisted he had killed her by knocking her in the head in the motor car.

The question naturally arises:

Was the killer of the unknown woman near Cranford a year later the man who killed Miss Brown? Was he the killer of Miss Brown, more hardened by crime, or hardened by the progress of a mental disease?

Problems for Probers.

The man who killed the unidentified woman a year later shot her over the left ear. He took her body from the car at a lonely spot, covered the body with gasoline and set it afire, presumably near the head. Whether he gained by adding robbery to murder cannot be established until the name of the victim is learned.

Here is the problem for those who attempt to solve mysterious crimes by analyzing the mental processes of the criminals:

Were the two murders committed by the same man who applied experience gained from his mistakes in the first murder?

Or were the murders in no wise related?

Or did the murderer of the unidentified woman know about the 1928 case and benefit by the mistakes of the first murderer by making sure of disfiguring the woman's face by applying the match to the upper part of the body?

Or was the second murderer just naturally more intelligent, or cunning, and sufficiently more callous than the first murderer, to be a witness to the disfigurement of the face of the woman who had been alive in his company a few minutes before?

Rare Treatment Saves Man's Life

Paris. — The operation of blood transfusion direct to the heart has been successfully performed by two French physicians, Achard and Corunand.

Describing the technique employed, in a paper read at a meeting of the Academy of Medicine, they explained that the patient, suffering from typhoid, had two relapses.

Intra-venous transfusion was out of the question, the patient being in a dying condition, and blood was injected into the cavities of the heart.

Improvement was rapid and the patient recovered.

X-Words for Nerves

Acton, England.—Summoned for failing to support his wife, Phillip Morton said he was unable to work and had to work cross-word puzzles for his nerves.

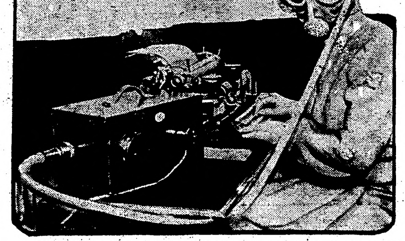
Once Poor Himself, Feeds Hungry Men

Boston.—John Carzi, well-known restaurant proprietor, is contented again, his annual "debt to America" having been paid when he gave free meals to 2,500 "down-and-outers."

This is the second year that Carzi has given a party to the destitute. When he came to this country twelve years ago he was nearly penniless and he feels that he owes a "debt to America" because this country has given him an opportunity to live.

The good Samaritan provided 750 pounds of fresh pork, 85 pounds of fresh ground beef, 600 loaves of bread, plenty of vegetables and more than 200 gallons of coffee, topping off with pie and ice cream.

Would Your Stenographer Wear This?



A prominent Berlin physician has invented a mask for inhaling which can be used by any sufferer from bronchial trouble while working. The mask fits closely in front of the face, with glass insets for sight. A tube is connected with a box containing the inhaling mixture which is carried over the head to the nose. The bad air is carried away by a special respirator fixed over the mouth.

SEAT IN PARLIAMENT GOES WITH ISLAND UP FOR SALE

Highest Bidder for Brechou, Small Isle in English Channel, Gets Both.

Southampton, England. — Anybody want to buy a seat in a parliament, even if it is not much of a parliament?

If so, the would-be M. P. or parliamentarian has only to make the highest bid for the island, or islet, of Brechou, in the Channel islands, which is now for sale.

Ownership of Brechou carries with it a seat in the parliament of Sark. Sark is seven miles east of Guernsey, where the cows come from, and measures three and one-half miles long by one and one-half miles wide and has a normal population of considerably under 1,000.

Brechou is a quarter of a mile west of Sark and is politically a part of [illegible] itself retains many of the queer rights, privileges, and sometimes obligations of the Channel islands, which have a history as quaint as their people. Until a year ago the Channel islands were exempt from the dreaded British inheritance taxes.

Local self-government, based upon customs, laws, grants, charters, treaties, and what not, is strong in the Channel islands. Much of the custom is French rather than English, and French of an antiquated type, resembling the Norman French, is the official language in many instances. To be an M. P. in the parliament of Sark is not an empty honor, and is worth having by a wealthy man with a love of the quaint.

Brechou has been in the hands of one family for many years. It has a dwelling house and farm, an arable plateau, nearly a mile of winding road, fishing and hunting facilities and an excellent landing place for motorboats.

The island is the same size as Jethou, the Channel paradise belonging to Compton Mackenzie, the novelist.

The silver mines of Little Sark are also up for sale. Parts of these mines, which were abandoned 80 years ago as unproductive, run 300 feet below the sea, but the land area comprises some twenty acres of pasture.

This property also claims a separate and practically independent existence on its own side of the isthmus.

Pole Buys Farm Held 292 Years by One Family

Springfield, Mass.—A tract of 20 acres in the adjoining town of Agawam, part of a tract granted by William Pynchon, founder of Springfield, to John Leonard 292 years ago, which had been handed down through ten generations of the family, has been sold to Ida Nacewitz, a Polish-American farmer.

The wording of the original grant by Pynchon in 1637 conveyed a tract extending rather vaguely many miles to the west.

Drop in Meat Eating

The average American ate about 5 pounds less meat last year than he did the year before, and 8 pounds less than in 1926, a summary prepared by the Department of Commerce indicates.

There has been a steady decline in the amount of beef and veal consumed, while pork has climbed but insufficiently to balance the loss in beef products. Lamb and mutton have held about even. Beef consumption has dropped from a per capita figure of 63.6 pounds in 1926 to 51.7 in 1928, while pork has risen from 65.7 to 73.9. Lamb and mutton have stood at approximately 5½ pounds and veal has dropped from 8.2 pounds to 6.8 pounds.

WHAT DR. CALDWELL LEARNED IN 47 YEARS PRACTICE

A physician watched the results of constipation for 47 years, and believed that no matter how careful people are of their health, diet and exercise, constipation will occur from time to time. Of next importance, then, is how to treat it when it comes. Dr. Caldwell always was in favor of getting as close to nature as possible, hence his remedy for constipation, known as Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, is a mild vegetable compound. It can not harm the system and is not habit forming. Syrup Pepsin is pleasant-tasting, and youngsters love it.

Dr. Caldwell did not approve of drastic physics and purges. He did not believe they were good for anybody's system. In a practice of 47 years he never saw any reason for their use when Syrup Pepsin will empty the bowels just as promptly.

Do not let a day go by without a bowel movement. Do not sit and hope, but go to the nearest druggist and get one of the generous bottles of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, or write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. BB, Monticello, Illinois, for free trial bottle.

WHEN IT LOOKS DARK to any weak, nervous or ailing woman, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription comes to her aid. Women in every walk of life today say Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a reliable medicine. It is made from roots and herbs, sold by druggists, in both fluid and tablets.

Mrs. L. Phillips, 1008—3rd St., Beloit, Wis., said: "When I was about grown my blood seemed to be thin and I was weak and poor. Finally my mother started giving me Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and in a short time I was well and stout. Mother recommends the 'Favorite Prescription' in general for woman's weakness. She says the value of the 'Prescription' at middle life cannot be overestimated. She knows from her own experience, as she had dizzy spells and could not sleep, but the 'Prescription' made her a well woman."

Send 10c for trial pkg. tablets to Dr. Pierce's Invalids Hotel, Buffalo, N. Y.

Uncle Sam's Warships

United States battleships are named after states, cruisers after cities, destroyers after naval heroes or men who have been conspicuous in naval affairs. Submarines bear numbers and mine sweepers are named after birds. The two ammunition ships of the navy are the Nitro and the Pyro. Some of the more unusual names are the Umpqua, Tillamook, Oglala, Monocacy, Kidder and Koka.

Are You Ready

When your Children Cry for It

Baby has little upsets at times. All your care cannot prevent them. But you can be prepared. Then you can do what any experienced nurse would do—what most physicians would tell you to do—give a few drops of plain Castoria. No sooner done than Baby is soothed; relief is just a matter of moments. Yet you have eased your child without use of a single doubtful drug; Castoria is vegetable. So it's safe to use as often as an infant has any little pain you cannot pat away. And it's always ready for the crueler pangs of colic, or constipation or diarrhea; effective, too for older children. Twenty-five million bottles were bought last year.

MAY REACH MOON, THINKS CURTISS

Aviator Sees Planes Making Trips Some Day.

Miami, Fla.—Glenn Curtiss, famous aviator, father of commercial aviation and builder of the airplane products which bear his name, said that man will some day reach both the moon and the planet Venus. During an interview, he was asked: "What are the probabilities of interplanetary communication? Do you believe man will ever reach the moon and possibly the planet Venus?"

"I think the time will come when man will fly from this earth to the moon," Mr. Curtiss replied. "It is not impossible. Anything man thinks of can eventually be made to come true.

"The weird stories we read recently concerning plans to fly to the moon are no harder to imagine than Jules Verne's exploits were when he wrote them more than three decades ago. And a good percentage of his predictions have come true. Around 40,000 feet is about as high as man has gone.

"The vehicle to carry a man to the moon will have to be extremely strong. It must carry enough oxygen and food to last him the entire journey. The biggest part of the feat will be navigation and it will take another Lindbergh to stay on the course to reach the objective."

Mr. Curtiss has made Miami his permanent home, having established a factory, two airplane bases and a flying school here.

All Living Plants Have Nerves, Says Scientist

London.—A theory that trees resemble human beings insofar as they are attracted and repulsed by the presence of human beings is put forward by Herbert G. Longford.

"It has been reserved to scientists of the present generation," he says, "to conceive and produce instruments of marvelous delicacy, proving by the production of visible record that all living plants have nerves which respond to electric shock, to heat and to cold—as do ours—and a throbbing pulse which varies naturally—as does our own—during times of wakefulness and sleep.

"Still further it can be proved by demonstration that their reactions to chloroform and other anesthetics are identical with the phenomena exhibited by the animal world.

"Grown trees, under the influence of drugs, has been transplanted with mutilated roots without shock, whereas untreated, similarly selected trees have died."

Student Farms Bring Profit to Indian Boys

Chilocco, Okla.—Individual student farms, once considered a foolish experiment, have solved the problem of training youthful Indian farmers.

Nearly forty Indian boys now cultivate separate tracts, ranging from sixty-three to seventy-five acres a piece, at the Chilocco Indian Agricultural school. Four thousand acres are under student cultivation.

Lawrence E. Correll, superintendent, aroused interest by telling the Indians the ground held "buried treasures." Each boy assigned a tract of ground averages $200 profit annually—one quarter of what he produces.

Younger boys are allowed to cultivate smaller tracts. The school either buys the grain for its own use or sells it at the market.

The Chilocco school's venture has been adopted as a model by Indian schools throughout the country.

6-Year-Old Royal Heir Drives Tiny Motor Car

Belgrade, Yugo-Slavia.—Crown Prince Peter of Yugo-Slavia, who has received a miniature automobile as a present for his sixth birthday, is learning to drive his car, under the close supervision of his royal mother, Queen Marie.

Prince Peter sits behind the wheel of the car and rides full speed through the palace grounds, King Alexander looking on, sometimes with anxiety, as the boy and his mother whirl around sharp corners.

Every morning the crown prince, in a uniform of a private in the Yugo-Slav army, goes through regular army drill, learns how to carry a miniature gun, how to salute and march.

He has just been promoted corporal, which indicates that Peter is a good soldier.

Clock Correct 368 Years

Historic Oak at Rome to Be Protected by City

Rome.—The famous oak on the Janiculum hill overlooking Rome, under which the great poet Tasso dreamed and mused, and St. Philip Neri played with the children of the neighborhood, is about to be enclosed and protected by the park service of the municipality.

Stricken by lightning a short time ago, little remains of the tree so intimately associated with Italian literary and religious tradition.

OIL AND MINERALS MAKE INDIANS RICH

Once Worthless Land Now Yields Fortunes.

Oklahoma City, Okla.—The Osage and Quapaw Indian tribes enjoy untold riches because the white man put them on land he did not want.

When the reservations were marked off, nobody dreamed that some day the hills given to the Osages would be dotted with oil derricks and the prairie set aside for the Quapaws would yield zinc and lead as well as hay.

Today the Osages are the richest people on earth, the 2,229 "headrights" or estates in the tribe exceeding $100,000 each in value. Unlike the Quapaws, the Osages hold their wealth in common.

The lead and zinc holdings of the Quapaws bring more than $1,500,000 in royalties to 65 restricted members of the tribe, but marriage and inheritance have served to distribute the money generally among the other members.

Once Penniless, Now Rich.

Mrs. Anna Beaver Bear Hallam, restricted owner of land on which is located the Anna Beaver mine, owned by Harry Payne Whitney of New York, gets some of the largest royalty payments. For several months her income from the metals piled up at the rate of $50,000 a month. Four years ago she was almost penniless.

The Quapaws were a nomadic tribe when they were placed on their present reservation in 1887. The land was valued at a dime an acre by white men.

Under the treaty by which the tribe was given the reservation, the government, "in view of their wretched and impoverished condition," agreed to move the Quapaws to their new home and to furnish them live stock, farm implements, firearms and other equipment.

Nothing except hay was produced on the tribe's new land. White men leased it paying the Indians a pittance. The town of Quapaw sprang up and became the greatest hay shipping point in the world for a time. The Indians cared nothing for the hay, the land or much of anything else. They wanted to fish and hunt and be left alone.

Finds Zinc Ore.

In 1905 zinc ore was found while a water well was being drilled on the land of Felix Dardene, a Quapaw Indian. The driller knew the metal in the cuttings from his drill denoted a rich stake, but he lacked the business sense to take advantage of the opportunity to win a great fortune.

He quit work and drove to Baxter Springs, Kan., where he spread the news. A bystander in one of the crowds the driller drew slipped away and visited Dardene, leasing all his land and much surrounding it. He made a fortune.

It has meant something to be an Osage Indian with a large family born prior to 1907, when the tribal allotment of lands was made. Each Osage was given more than 700 acres that year. A man with a wife and five children had control of 5,000 acres of land and received $21,000 quarterly until the eldest child became of age.

Distinction of having the largest Osage family was held by Clement de Noya. He controlled eleven headrights, including his own, his wife's and those of their nine children. This family has received as much as $40,000 in one quarterly payment.

"Daily Dozen" Precepts Called 2,000 Years Old

San Francisco.—Modern health precepts are 2,000 years old, according to Dr. Obed S. Johnson, University of California extension division lecturer in Chinese culture. In a recent study of Chinese alchemy, Doctor Johnson discovered that Taoist philosophers believed immortality might be attained through mental and physical exercises, including proper breathing and gymnastics.

He quotes one writer as saying that "to learn the proper use of the breath, one should inhale a deep breath through the nose, stop up the nose and mentally count one's heartbeats." This Taoist philosopher held that breath should be retained until the count reached 120, and after practice, until 1,000 was counted.

Town Is Asked to Pay $5 Note 58 Years Old

Washington.—A financial obligation incurred by the city of Alexandria 58 years ago has been called to the attention of the city council in a letter from the comptroller of currency.

The obligation is represented in a note for $5 issue by the Corporation of Alexandria on October 1, 1860. It was all a surprise to the council, and when it developed that there was no provision for the redemption of the note or any official record of its existence, Councilman Timberman came to the rescue and redeemed the note. He explained that he wanted it as a souvenir.

Members of the council expressed curiosity as to where the note has been hiding all these years and also as to how it came into the hands of the comptroller's office.

SOCIAL LIFE RUN BY RIGID RULES

Washington Hostesses Must Watch Their Step.

Washington.—Hostesses who come into this capital city with the new administration are certain to find that their social knowledge, however extensive it may be, is not adequate to take care of every situation likely to arise during their stay.

Occasions of ceremony in the national capital follow certain rules and regulations, ignorance of which often brings humiliation; and indifference to those rules calls down stern criticism upon the offender.

Indeed, it is the wise newcomer who acquaints herself with the rules. By so doing she will not only simplify life for everyone, but will also save herself much embarrassment.

Washington is different from European capitals in this respect. On the continent when statesmen are dined and feted, there is a "protocol" which assigns to every one his or her relative rank, and does so with the official sanction of the government.

No such court of appeals exists in the capital of this country. There are available in the State department certain rules and regulations. The department, however, refuses to be quoted as an authority and supplies no written lists.

It is up to the individual to do the proper thing.

And the proper thing to the uninitiated at times presents a real problem. Foreign ambassadors and ministers are not, as Lincoln is said to have been: "Willing to follow anyone who wants to precede them." They represent their country or their rulers, whose dignity they are responsible for upholding in their own persons. To use the words of a clever and distinguished ambassador: "Since the Good God made us so that we cannot get through the door at once, there must be precedence."

Each year Washington sees men come here in official positions of great importance. They represent sovereign states, each one proud of its dignity. An affront to them is an affront to those states.

Thus the wives of Washington officials are faced by conditions not duplicated anywhere. And they soon come to know that knowledge of the rank of officials at dinners is necessary, not merely in giving entertainments, but even in attending those given by others.

Soldier Lives With Big Hole in Skull

San Juan, P. R.—With a hole in his skull as big as a half dollar where a .45 calibre revolver bullet, fired through the roof of his mouth a month ago, emerged, William Barrio, twenty-four, a soldier, still lives and is expected to recover control of nearly all of his faculties.

Barrio, who is serving his second enlistment in the regular army, was tired of life. While walking post he inserted the muzzle of his revolver into his mouth and pulled the trigger. Rushed to the military hospital, the doctors removed two cupfuls of brain substance, and in three days the patient had regained consciousness. He is unable to speak, but understands what is said to him.

The man's chances of living for a great many years are good. The doctors insist that if death comes it will not be as the result of the bullet that plowed through the brain. A disease of the brain on the order of meningitis may follow, but as yet there are no symptoms.

Cambridge Invents "Universal English"

London, England.—Cambridge scientists and scholars have evolved an international language of 500 words.

English is the basic tongue chosen and it is claimed that people of all nations may pick up "panoptic English," as the reduced vocabulary is called, within a few weeks or months, instead of years.

The entire vocabulary of "panoptic English" can be printed on the back of a single sheet of notepaper and seen at a glance, hence its name "panoptic."

In the new language the majority of verbs vanish and in their place are twelve "operators" or fundamental verbs which cover the essential movements of persons and things. They are come, get, give, go, keep, let, make, put, take, be, do and have.

Gander Nurses Young After Goose's Death

Beaver Creek, N. C.—Sauce for the goose gave a Beaver Creek gander a full winter's work and he has just succeeded in "weaning" four goslings he adopted last fall when their mother died soon after hatching them. The gander, Arthur Merrill, his owner, declared, worked himself thin nursing his brood through the winter and has taken on new life since his breed has ceased to waddle quackingly at his web-footed heels.

NICE WORDS WON'T DYE a dress or coat...

Naval observatory officials, determined to solve this puzzling problem, have worked out a plan of procedure. Leading governments located on other continents have become interested and joined in this most extraordinary undertaking.

A big job. And yet a comparatively simple one! The process is termed world-longitudinal determination. This is how they go about it.

For a period of 60 days powerful wireless stations owned by the co-operating governments, and stations in California, China and Africa, forming a world girdle, sent out frequent time signals, each at carefully predetermined times. Meanwhile, leading observatories in America and Europe radio-broadcast accurate time signals. All such signals received were painstakingly recorded by all interested parties. After making proper allowances for necessary lapsed time in the process of signal transmission and synchronizing all records, the tabulated result of the combined record, time scientists declare, should disclose whether America has slipped and, if so, which way and how far.

If it develops that continental slippage has occurred, those engaged in the work hold out no hope and in fact have no plan for forcing the continent back to its former position. It shall have to remain right where they find it to be. They do point out, however, that the finding will enable the interested governments to correct their official maps and longitudinal records and eliminate the uncertainty which has prevailed, all of which will be of immeasurable value from astronomical and longitudinal standpoints.

IMITATION
is the Highest tribute to Maytag Quality

THE Gyrafoam washer action, originated by The Maytag Company, changed the trend of washer design. Imitators by the score pay tribute to its success.

The Maytag Counter-Sunk Gyratator makes the water agitate the clothes, forcing the water through the clothes, keeping the clothes separated and circulating instead of packed into bunches.

As it was stated in last week's issue that there was one less in the two thousand pound list this year then last year, but nevertheless S. H. Nohre was overlooked. His cream delivery for 1928 was 2411 pounds. It is a treat to us when someone who has been left out of the Honor Roll will come and tell us about it. So when you find any mistake don't be afraid to bring it up as it is not done intentionally.

Sensible

It was during the discussion of a new story for a motion picture that Julian Johnson, tossing aside the trashy attempt of some amateur writer, delivered himself of this sage opinion:

"Too frequently, what we call common sense is merely lack of imagination. Too frequently, what we call imagination is merely lack of common sense."—Los Angeles Times.

Showing It Can Be Done

Putting through a practical, well-organized safety program the Bethlehem Steel corporation last year reduced its number of accidents 28 per cent as compared with 1927. Number of fatalities were cut down 34 per cent and amount of time lost due to accidents 24 per cent. All this was accomplished in the face of its greatest year's business since 1917. That is something to brag about, more so at least than big earnings, size of plants, etc.—Capper's Weekly.

But Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery restored my health and strength. The other medicines I took did me no good. I cannot possibly say too much in its praise. COUNTING INDIANS AN EXACTING JOB

Woman Completes Task of Listing 50,000 Navahos.

Washington.—Counting Indians may sound like a simple occupation, but Miss Rachel Jenss, who has tagged 50,000 Navahos for their great white father in Washington, found there was a trick in it.

She just has completed a census of the chiefs, medicine men, squaws, papooses—all the Indians on the Navaho reservation in northern Arizona, Utah, Colorado and New Mexico, for the Indian bureau of the Interior department.

"When I started," she said, "I walked miles and miles on roads along the canyons and—I couldn't find an Indian! I had white guides.

"Then I thought of getting an Indian guide, and when I did I found that previously I had been walking past and over Indians all the time. The Navaho guides took me down the canyons and into the recesses of the hills, and there we found large groups whose presence could not even be suspected from the upper trails."

The census was made in the absence of birth certificates in the tribes. The Navaho reservation contains vast stores of undeveloped wealth, and the Indian bureau wanted to establish rolls of the tribe in order that, when the question of property rights arose, there would be no doubt as to the identity of members of the tribe.

Miss Jenss, a native of Michigan and a statistician trained at Vassar college, was in charge of the entire undertaking. She obtained two names of each Indian—his native name and the English one—and the age, sex, tribe, degree of native blood and family relationships.

She is now making a similar census of the Papago and Pima tribes in Arizona. She has a staff of white and English guides working at Indian bureau centers. One of her headquarters is the famous old San Xavier mission near Tucson.

Adrift 6 Days on Ice, Five Eskimos Survive

Ottawa, Ont.—The story of how a hunting party of Eskimos fought hunger and exhaustion for six days on an ice floe in Hudson straits without food or shelter was relayed to officials here by the government radio station at Nottingham island, where the five finally found refuge.

The men had set out February 21, venturing several hundred yards out on the ice in search of game. Without warning the ice on which they were broke adrift from the shore ice, on which were their dog teams and supplies.

The floe drifted about in the pack ice of the straits. They had only their sealskin clothing to chew to appease their hunger and had to keep moving constantly to keep from freezing.

Finally their floe touched shore and the men made their way through 30 miles of wilderness to Boucherville.

Colonial House Saved by Art School at Yale

New Haven, Conn.—A house built in North Branford in 1710 and carefully taken apart for Yale university when it was about to be demolished has been restored in part in the new gallery of the Yale art school.

The house yielded original wall paneling, windows, doors, cornices and other decorative pieces. These are regarded by authorities as truly representative of the American colonial and federal periods.

Two rooms have been set up, and through the gift of Francis P. Garvan, Yale '97, early Connecticut pieces and portraits have been hung on the walls to give the atmosphere of a colonial home 200 years ago.

Sensitive About Legs

Baltimore, Md.—Mrs. Elizabeth Justice had a husband who was sensitive about his bow legs. Accusing her of laughing at him, the husband left home, never to return. She was granted a divorce.

Easily Identified

Nashville, Tenn.—A bandit who took $6,700 in jewelry from two Nashville homes is described as "a nice-looking young fellow who is often seen walking on uptown streets."

Rides 90 Miles Each Morning to His Class

Seattle, Wash.—When Raymond Jaureguy is graduated from the University of Washington he will be fully prepared to catch the 7:48 train for the office. He might well be said to be majoring in commuting.

Every day he makes a 90-mile trip to an eight o'clock class, and he is always on time.

Jaureguy lives in Tacoma. When he leaves home in the dark of morning, he takes a 30-minute street car ride, then boards a train and comes to Seattle and takes a street car to the campus.

"I study on the train," he said. "Nobody disturbs you."

It was believed Jaureguy holds a national record for distance traveled regularly by a student.

CHILDREN SUCCEED WITH DOG LAUNDRY

Advertising Helps Three Ohio Kids in Venture.

Wapakoneta, Ohio.—A dog laundry is a somewhat new and novel business but two young boys of twelve and a pretty little titian-haired girl of ten successfully inaugurated such an enterprise, and already can look back on a month of actual operation of cleaning dogs and cats at a profit.

The partners in what is probably Ohio's most unique and unusual business, Charles Fleming, Jr., Fenton Hamilton, and Margaret Hamilton, sat back in their "office" here and discussed with all the nonchalance of seasoned business leaders their occupation.

The firm is known as "Fleming, Hamilton & Company, specialists in rejuvenation and renovating the soiled coats of cats and dogs, mongrel or pedigreed."

Dog Beauty Shop.

Their place of business is in the basement of the Hamilton residence, which is accessible by means of a flight of steps leading off the street. At the head of the steps hangs a neat shingle with the inscripton "Dog beauty shop. Prices to fit the pocketbook of any dog or cat, large or small, big and fat, scrawny or otherwise," daubed in approved advertising fashion.

On the wall, inside the "office," hangs another sign, written neatly and plainly to catch the eye of the prospective client. It reads:

Tan dogs washed—20 cents.
Black dogs washed—20 cents.
Spotted dogs washed—25 cents.
Curly-haired dogs washed—20 cents extra.

Burrs and chewing-gum wads, the bane of all well-groomed and dapper doggish "beau brummels," get the special attention of the trio of dog beautifiers.

No Soap in Eyes.

The pet cleaners assert on their price lists that dogs and cats committed to their care will receive "kind treatment, and no soap in their eyes." For 10 cents extra the pets will be called for and delivered.

The company is extremely versatile in their methods of conducting the business. Certain feats of beautification can be executed "for a consideration," according to one of the numerous signs or price lists decorating the walls.

Suppose you want the dog's tail curled, with perhaps a little kink here and there in the hair. The firm will put a permanent wave in the tail or hair—how permanent has not yet been demonstrated—"guaranteed not to fade," the sign reads.

Famous Rubens Canvas Lost 100 Years, Found

Berlin.—A famous painting by Rubens, "David's Fight With the Bear," which has been lost for more than a hundred years, has been found in a shop of a Berlin art dealer. It is one of eight pictures taken by Rubens on his mission to the Spanish court in 1614, and was last seen in 1827.

Its authenticity has been testified to by Dr. Wilhelm Bode, one of Europe's greatest art authorities, and Dr. Ludwig Burchard.

The history of the painting since its disappearance has not been divulged, though it is believed it was the property of a German prince who has been compelled to sell the picture because of straitened circumstances. The prince's name is kept secret, though in certain circles there is speculation the painting was in the possession of the former crown prince.

Seek Method to Teach Dogs to Avoid Motors

Boston.—The Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals announces a prize of $250 for the best answer to the question, "How humanely, and at the same time effectively, can a dog be trained to guard himself from injury by the automobile?" The society reports an average of two dogs daily brought to its hospital injured by automobiles.

The prize offer is nation-wide. Answers are limited to 1,500 words and will be submitted to a committee of experts to be chosen from well known breeders of dogs. All answers must be mailed to the office of Our Dumb Animals, No. 180 Longwood avenue, Boston, by July 1.

Million-Year-Old Sloth on Exhibition at Yale

New Haven, Conn.—What was termed "the most remarkable fossil that has ever come to light," has been placed on exhibition at Yale's Peabody museum. It is a Nothrotherium, a type of ground sloth that lived in Arizona 1,000,000 years ago. The sloth was trapped in a pit and even portions of its hide and sinew were preserved in the accumuations of ages in which it was buried.

Manila Police Seek to Arrest Man Dead 9 Years

Manila.—Police received information that one Pedro Tenorio had violated a city ordinance by throwing waste water into a canal. So a delegation sallied forth to the Tenorio home to make an arrest. There they learned, and subsequently confirmed by health service records, that the accused died on March 7, 1920.

OLD BORDER POST NOW TOURIST CAMP

Fort Wilkins Never Fired Hostile Shot.

Fort Wilkins, Mich.—The unprotected borders of the United States and Canada, an oft-cited example that two peoples can live in peace, revives the story of Fort Wilkins, the last army post on the northern boundary line.

Not since its garrison marched away shortly after the Civil war have its confines echoed to martial tread. It now is a state park, and tourists camp beneath its trees, where sentries alert for the war cry of Indian braves once walked their posts.

Just a cannon shot away, across the water of Lake Superior, is the imaginary line separating Canada from the United States.

Never once in the life of the old fort was a gun fired from its confines in hostility. Fort Wilkins was established in 1844, temporarily abandoned in 1846, reoccupied in 1869 and finally deserted in 1870.

The post was built at the end of Michigan's thumb, the Keweenaw peninsula, as a protection to early copper miners and settlers against Indian aggression. There, too, lurked in the minds of officials that the United States some day might need to defend its northern frontier.

The first garrisoned troops, who built the post, hewed the logs from virgin timber. Later the buildings were clapboarded and when the state took over the post the fort was well preserved.

Protecting the inclosure on the north and east was a stockade of posts, fastened with hand-made wooden pegs. Lake Fanny Hooe provided protection on the south side, and there was a rapidly flowing stream on the west.

The post, although somewhat modernized by the summer's flow of motorists, remains a page out of the past in the industrialized present of Michigan's copper country.

Russia Draws Many Workers From U. S.

Riga, Latvia.—Consular officials in Riga estimate that 30,000 former residents of the United States are living in Soviet Russia.

Every month more enter and others come out, while many of those who remain bombard the American consulate, across the frontier in Riga, with letters pleading for papers that would permit them to return to America.

Most of the thousands who have gone into Russia since the revolution, looking for a worker's earthly paradise, are living in small towns, communes and villages.

They are brought to Riga by steamship companies in large parties and sent into Russia from here. Each immigrant is obliged on entering a red commune to have a minimum capital of $500 and to surrender his American passport before entering the new world that Lenin created.

Chew of Tobacco Solves Mystery of Burglaries

York, Neb.—A chew from a plug of tobacco was the undoing here of Leon Hudson and led officers to the discovery of the perpetrator of more than forty burglaries in and near York county during January and February. Hudson had been arrested as a suspect.

The burglar apparently had worked with gloves, as no finger prints were found, and the only clews left were footprints and a plug of tobacco from which a bite had been taken, leaving a perfect imprint of teeth.

The sheriff at Aurora played cards with a number of prisoners and invited all to "have a chew." Hudson was the only one to accept and his teeth prints were found to be like those in the state's exhibit. He later made a confession to all burglaries of which he had been suspected.

Some Are That Dumb

Bordeaux, France.—A man hailed Jules Durand, taxi driver, and engaged him to go to Bergerac, 50 miles distant. Thinking the "fare" was aboard, Durand drove to Bergerac, where he found that the man had never got into his cab. He's trying to collect, but it's difficult.

3,000-Horse Power Engine Built

Vienna.—A 3,000 horse-power railway locomotive, said to be the largest and most powerful in Europe, has been built here for use on steep Alpine grades. Auxiliary engines as pushers on mountain routes are entirely dispensed with by the new locomotive.

Girl, 14, Becomes Chief of Menominee Indians

Green Bay, Wis.—A fourteen-year-old girl now rules the Menominee Indians—the first of her sex to head the tribe.

Princess Kenoke, daughter of Chief Ernest Oshkosh, who died a short time ago, assumed leadership under a deathbed command of her grandfather, Chief Neopit Oshkosh. She is known outside the tribe as Alice C. Oshkosh.

Previously it was announced that the chieftaincy would be taken over by Chief Ernest Oshkosh's brother, Reginald. The Menominees reside on a reservation near here.

When Lucy Eloped —and How

By H. LOUIS RAYBOLD

(Copyright.)

"THIS time next week, young lady," concluded George Rowland, father to Lucy, "you and your mother will be headed for Europe. Watch your step!"

Lucy regarded her irate parent apprehensively. "Please may I write to Craig while I am away, daddy?"

"You may not! If he sends you flowers when you sail, throw them overboard. No daughter of mine shall have anything to do with a son of that man Blakesley. I don't even know the young whippersnapper. Don't want to know him!"

"And that's where the trouble lies!" cried poor Lucy. "If you would only consent to meet Craig, you would discover that, whatever his father may be, Craig himself is an ace!"

There was nothing, however, to be gained by further argument. Either she and Craig must take matters into their own hands and run away or pressure must be brought to bear from some new source. The alternative, giving each other up, was unthinkable.

As soon as a slammed door announced her father's departure, she called Craig on the telephone.

"There is no time to be lost, Craig. Father is about to have me taken to Europe. But first, I've a bit of an idea I would like to try out. You know that I have felt it was not quite loyal of me to let you take me to see your father, knowing how dad feels about him. But I am ready to throw loyalty overboard in a good cause. What is the best hour of the day to beard your parent in his den?"

Evidently Craig gave her whatever data was necessary for precisely at three a slender, fur-coated girl was admitted to the inner office of John B. Blakesley and any observer could have seen that there was a scared little look about her eyes.

After all, however, there was nothing remotely terrifying about the very genial man who rose at her entrance. It must be, thought Lucy, that only in his business dealings did he justify her father's opinion.

"So this is Rowland's daughter!" was his greeting. "My boy tells me your father opposes this match. For my part, I consider Craig a darn lucky beggar!"

Lucy dimpled. "I've come to ask you to change your mind about that!" she said demurely.

The two of them talked an hour, while out in the office two of John B's prospective customers cooled their heels.

That evening George Rowland was summoned to the telephone.

"Yes—yes—

"Well—Mr. Blakesley!

"You're absolutely opposed to—what? To your son having anything to do with my daughter? You want me to—well, of all things!

"He's coming here tomorrow afternoon to ask her to elope and you want me to throw him out? That's exactly what I had in mind myself! Good night!"

Furiously he turned to his daughter. "There you are!" he shouted. "Your—your young man's father doesn't want you in his family any more than I want him in mine. Now, where's your pride?"

But Lucy avoided a direct reply. Instead, "What was the trouble between you two?" she asked. "I never knew exactly."

"He trimmed me good and plenty in the market," said Rowland shortly, "using information that I had given him as a friend."

"How—how unlike him!" murmured Lucy thoughtfully.

"That's all you know about it," said her father, but her words were true. At least, it had been unlike the man he had always supposed Blakesley to be.

The following afternoon Lucy, waiting for Craig in the library, saw her father drive up and come up the steps. So he was going to be there to throw Craig out! Well, at least he would be able to see what a splendid young man he was first! But she hoped she hadn't carried things a bit too far.

"Waiting for that son of Blakesley's?" demanded her father. Then, at Lucy's nod, "I'll wait, too," he said curtly, and threw himself into one of the big leather chairs.

The familiar roll of Craig's sport roadster brought her heart to her throat. A second later and he stood on the threshold looking from one to the other.

Rowland rose slowly, with a keen glance at Craig. "Your father tells me you are planning to elope with my daughter," he said quietly. "Very well—I took passage for Lucy and her mother on the Homeric. I am thinking of cancelling it for a later date and letting the two of you go for a honeymoon!"

Then, drawing Lucy into his left arm and extending his right hand to Craig, "I know enough to acknowledge when I have been wrong," he said. "It got under my skin when I thought your father was opposed to my girl here and I went straight round this morning to see him about it. In the course of conversation, I learned that your father had never gotten the information I sent him. He showed me proofs of his having been up in the Adirondacks, beyond even the reach of a telegram. So—I apologize and—well, bless you, my children!"

What Will you do

When your Children Cry for It

There is hardly a household that hasn't heard of Castoria! At least five million homes are never without it. If there are children in your family, there's almost daily need of its comfort. And any night may find you very thankful there's a bottle in the house. Just a few drops, and that colic or constipation is relieved; or diarrhea checked. A vegetable product; a baby remedy meant for young folks. Castoria is about the only thing you have ever heard doctors advise giving to infants. Stronger medicines are dangerous to a tiny baby, however harmless they may be to grown-ups. Good old Castoria! Remember the name, and remember to buy it. It may spare you a sleepless, anxious night. It is always ready, always safe to use; in emergencies, or for everyday ailments. Any hour of the day or night that Baby becomes fretful, or restless. Castoria was never more popular with mothers than it is today. Every druggist has it.

Relative Importance

"John, how's your cold?"

"Why, I still have it, if that's what you mean."

"Did you go to a doctor?"

"Of course not! I wouldn't bother a doctor with my slight colds and petty ailments."

"Will you let me mix you a hot drink?"

"Don't go to the trouble. I'll get rid of it in time."

"John, you make me so provoked. Now if there was something wrong with your golf swing you'd read all the books you could get and hire the best professional at the club to correct it."

SAME PRESCRIPTION HE WROTE IN 1892

When Dr. Caldwell started to practice medicine, back in 1875, the needs for a laxative were not as great as today. People lived normal lives, ate plain, wholesome food, and got plenty of fresh air. But even that early there were drastic physics and purges for the relief of constipation which Dr. Caldwell did not believe were good for human beings.

The prescription for constipation that he used early in his practice, and which he put in drug stores in 1892 under the name of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, is a liquid vegetable remedy, intended for women, children and elderly people, and they need just such a mild, safe bowel stimulant.

This prescription has proven its worth and is now the largest selling liquid laxative. It has won the confidence of people who needed it to get relief from headaches, biliousness, flatulence, indigestion, loss of appetite and sleep, bad breath, dyspepsia, colds, fevers. At your druggist, or write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. BB, Monticello, Illinois, for free trial bottle.

CHAPTER I

—1—

"There's a lady asking for you, Mr. Hanby. She says she won't go away until she sees you."

Hanby looked at Smucker, and sighed. The secretary—he had chosen this designation himself—was a small, thin man with an active Adam's apple, who despised tact as something beneath him. Hanby had often set out for his offices in Leonard street with the intention of letting Smucker go, and of replacing him with a neat, smiling, efficient girl; but invariably some sixth sense informed Smucker of his danger. Invariably he would speak of his vast responsibilities, of his large family, of his invalid father, of the house he was buying on the installment plan, and of the ravages of insects in his little garden.

A neat, smiling, and efficient girl would have known that her employer was busy, and would have found out what the visitor's errand was.

"What does she want?" inquired Hanby.

Smucker assumed his superior air.

"She wouldn't say. Otherwise I should have informed you, Mr. Hanby."

"What do you think she wanted?"

"I suspect she is desirous of selling you a dog."

Hanby brightened.

"That's easy. Explain in well-chosen language that in another incarnation I was a priest of Bubastis. I cannot, therefore, as a one-time worshiper of the Sacred Cat, buy dogs from strange ladies."

Adolf Smucker sighed. His employer's frivolity always saddened him. He would have preferred to serve a sterner, more unbending, portlier, and older man, a man who never made jokes or saw them. Smucker often wondered why it was Hilton Hanby had succeded so well. A swift glance showed Smucker that his employer was looking at the photographs of the splendid estate he was about to buy.

Mr. Smucker passed to the outer office with slow step. The lady who would not go was the sort of person whom he always surveyed with hostile eyes. She wore too much jewelry and was enwrapped lavishly in fur.

"If," said he coldly, "you wish to sell one or more of your dogs, Mr. Hanby says for me to say he's not in the market."

The stranger pressed her three tiny beasts so closely to her that they yelped.

"Not all his money could buy even one of them!" she snapped. "I must see him. Tell him I shall stay here all day until he comes through that door."

"Madam, I suggest telephoning from a pay station."

"My darlings will not enter a telephone booth, and I dare not trust them to anyone else. Tell him I do not want to buy or sell. I have something to say of vital importance, and he will be wise to see me at once."

Mr. Smucker, who had all the nastier little curiosities about life which dwell so frequently with his sort, wondered if here at last he was to learn some hidden details of his employer's past. Hanby was a handsome and generous man. Women liked him. Perhaps this singular creature had a daughter who had trusted too well.

"Something about his past?" Mr. Smucker suggested.

"Something about my past," flamed the caller.

Mr. Smucker turned on his heel and re-entered the private office.

"It isn't the dogs," said he. "What she wants is a private conversation about the past. I may be wrong, Mr. Hanby—I hope I am—but I think she knows something about your past which may not be creditable to you."

"Thank you, Smucker!" said Hanby. "I can always trust you to take the kindly view. You are quite right. My past was blacker than night. If I had my deserts, I should long ago have been electrocuted. Bring the lady in. I trust she is beautiful!"

Smucker went out, offended. As usual, Hanby had laughed at him. Well, the day was not so far distant when Adolf Smucker would have his turn! He wasted a lot of office time dreaming of what he would do when he was in power.

"Madam, I have persuaded the boss to see you," he said loftily. Then he jumped back. "That black dog nearly bit me!"

"I can rely on his instincts," she said. "You stand convicted as one whom no woman should trust. Do not attempt to deny it, and don't move your throat in that impudent manner!"

She swept past him into his employer's room.

If he had expected youth or beauty, Hanby was disappointed. It was a tall, gaunt old woman who faced him. He judged that some day, now long distant, she had been beautiful. He could see that she was richly dressed, and that the jewels she wore were costly. There was a look of tragedy in her smoldering dark eyes.

"I'm afraid you were kept waiting," Hanby began pleasantly.

"I have been kept waiting for thirty years," she said.

"At least you cannot blame me for that." He observed that her eyes were fixed on the photographs of the house he had made arrangements to buy. "I don't think you sent in your card."

"My name is Selenos," she said.

"Selina?" Hanby asked.

"Selenos, Selenos," she repeated. "If you were a Californian, it would be a familiar name. There is the Selenos river."

"And you were named after it? I was born near a big river, too, but I had a lucky escape. Think of me as going through life labeled Housatonic Hanby!"

"The river was named after me," she explained.

Mr. Hanby thought a moment.

"Of course California came into the Union late, didn't it? In the forties, I think."

"The river was named after my family, not after me personally; but I did not come here to discuss my family affairs or to listen to yours. You are about to buy an estate near Pine Plains?"

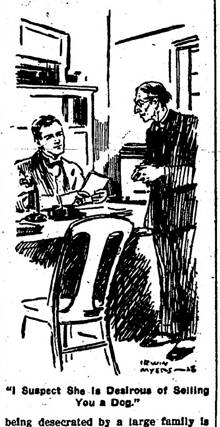
"I am to complete the purchase this afternoon."

"You must not go there!" she cried dramatically. "I cannot allow it!"

Her manner began to antagonize Hanby.

"Why not?" he inquired coldly.

"It is sacred ground, and you are not fit to dwell there. The idea of its being desecrated by a large family is intolerable!"



"I Suspect She Is Desirous of Selling You a Dog."

"Really, Mrs. Selenos—" he began.

"Miss," she said. "Above all else I despise and loathe men. Men have always oppressed me. How they have lied and perjured themselves to keep me from the Gray house! But at last I am in a position to buy their silence. What did you give for the place?"

"That, my dear lady," he said suavely, "is entirely my own affair."

"I expected you to lie," she said. "A man of your type would." Miss Selenos took out her check book. "Well, what profit do you decide to make? I wish to buy the place from you."

"It is not for sale."

"You dare to refuse to sell?" Her voice rose so that the dogs barked furiously. "After all my years of waiting, of persecution, of bitterness and exile, you dare to refuse?"

"It is not for sale. I am sorry, but my heart is set on the place as a home. You have had plenty of time. It has been empty for some years."

"I am only now able to buy it. If you will not sell, will you rent it?"

"I am going to live there as soon as it is ready."

"I despise and loathe men," she cried, "and of all men I loathe and despise you most! Of the innumerable houses in this country you deliberately chose this one because it will hurt me!" She raised her right hand to heaven. "Those who have tried to kill me in the past have perished. You and your family and all that is yours I put under a curse. You are going to a house of tragedy, a house wherein walk ghosts of those foully murdered!"

"I'm afraid that's the wrong tack," he said soothingly. "I am not to be frightened away like that. You are not fair to me. A house was for sale, and I bought it. Loathe and despise me as you will, but do not go away thinking I have wronged you."

"You have wronged me!" she shrieked, her black eyes flashing hate.

"Ah, ha!" muttered Adolf Smucker, who had hitherto listened unsuccessfully. Pausing a moment, he opened the door, as the signal bell had commanded him to. Apparently the strange woman was placing under a comprehensive curse Hanby and all that was his. Smucker gathered that his employer was one of a band of hardened men whose entire energies were expended in keeping Miss Selenos from the Gray house.

"You go there at your peril!" she shouted.

"I accept the risk," said Hanby, quite unruffled.

"My vengeance will follow you," she added.

"Delightful!" Hanby told her. "I shall escape the monotony that my friends prophesy."

Smucker, who was always nervous in the presence of unusual violence, almost admired Hanby for his calm.

"This way, madam," said Smucker. He led her to the elevator. Mrs. Smucker in her Weehawken home would enjoy this. When the grille of the elevator door had closed upon Miss Selenos and her pets, Smucker went back to the office smiling. Mrs. Smucker would certainly enjoy this. So would his old father, and the men he talked to on the ferry. As a rule they talked about taxing the rich. Taxing the rich was a passion with Smucker, and he pursued his hobby viciously.

But Smucker did not catch his usual boat. It was late when he returned to his home. By that time the strange visitor and her pets had been driven from his mind by other things. Outside the office a big man, red-faced and jocund, slapped him on the back.

"Say," the stranger said, "ain't you Mr. Hanby's confidential clerk?"

Smucker looked about him. No member of the office staff was visible.

"Yes," he said with confidence. "I am, but you have the advantage of me."

"I want you to fix it so I can get a word in private with the boss. I want to see him right away."

"He goes home at half past four. I stay till six."

"I guess you have to, being his confidential man." The stranger was evidently pondering over something of importance.

"Do you happen to know if he's considering purchasing a big estate up in Dutchess county?"

"He completed the purchase this afternoon," said Smucker.

The news brought dismay to the red face of the stranger. Almost it seemed as if he suffered.

"My G—d!" he cried. "And him with a family!"

"Why shouldn't he buy it?" Smucker asked. "He's got the money, as I happen to know."

"I can't tell you here," the other replied; "but I'd like you to give him a message from me before it's too late. Had your dinner?"

"Not yet."

"How about a bite to eat now?"

Smucker considered the matter with the deliberation that a confidential clerk might be expected to show. He was a heavy eater when another man footed the bill, but he was also prudent. He did not feel drawn to this big, coarse stranger. Furthermore, he wished to be sure that this was a genuine invitation. It would be of no advantage to pay for a meal while in fair Weehawken a pot roast simmered for him.

Perhaps the stranger sensed the economic struggle.

"This is on me," he explained.

"Why?" Smucker demanded.

"Because I guess you have your boss' interests at heart, and I want you to tell him something. I'm pulling out for Chicago tonight, or I'd tell him myself. It's a warning."

"Some reference to a disgraceful past?" Smucker demanded eagerly.

"Some reference to a h—l of a future. There's a place down here run by a pal of mine—not much to look at, but the planked steaks, oh, baby! And there's some real beer that the sailors smuggle in."

"If it is really important, I suppose I must consider the welfare of my colleague before my own convenience."

Planked steak and real beer! Out, d—d pot roast!

Mr. Smucker ate with the peculiar ferocity that is sometimes seen in thin, undersized men.

Limit to Train Speed Under Best Conditions

When railway beds have been made as nearly perfect as possible; when the lines have been straightened and as far as practicable leveled, and when the best types of locomotives and cars have been devised, how fast will steam be able to carry us?

An answer to this question, based on a scientific examination of the conditions involved, is furnished by an authority on facts relating to railroads. One hundred miles an hour is about the limit of speed suggested.

Another very important question growing out of the first is: Within what distance can a train running 100 miles an hour, or but little less than 150 feet a second, be stopped? The reply is that under the most favorable conditions a distance of nearly half a mile would be required. A train running a mile a minute can be stopped, it is estimated, within a distance of 900 feet. By adding only two-thirds to the speed, therefore, the distance required for bringing the train to a standstill would be increased almost three times.

It is evident that when we are whirled across the country at the rate of 100 miles an hour "a clear track" will become a far more important necessity even than it is today.

Splendid Bell Tower Adorns Florida City

The bell tower recently erected, known as the "Singing Tower," is at Mountain Lake, Fla. It is in the center of the Mountain Lake Club grounds, in the heart of the city. Each day at sunset the carillon in the tower gives a recital and also on Sunday noon. The tower rises 205 feet, the pink of Georgia marble and the tan of Florida coquina stone giving it color. It is the design of Milton B. Medary, Philadelphia architect. The Singing tower has a base 50 feet wide. It is 40 feet wide at the top. The sculpture is the work of Lee Lawrie. Around the base of the tower are carved bands showing the flora and bird life of Florida. From a height of 160 feet to the top the entire tower is of pink marble, all sculptured. The eight great bell windows are decorated in the most gorgeously colored faience. To add a further Old world flavor, an old-fashioned English water moat 15 feet wide surrounds the tower. The tower door is more than 12 feet high and of solid golden bronze.

Olson-Nass

A very pretty wedding was solemnized at the home Mrs. F. T. Erickson, Wednesday evening April 10, at 7 o'clock, when her niece, Miss Linnea Olson became the bride of John Nass, son of Mr. and Mrs. August Nass, of Holt. Preceding the ceremony Mrs. Erickson sang "Oh! Promise Me!" Miss Ruth Erickson, a cousin of the bride, played Lohengrin's wedding march as the bridal party entered and took their places under a beautifully festooned arch and wedding bell. Mable Nass, a sister of the groom of Holt, was bridesmaid, and wore a dress of orchid silk flat crepe, and carried white and pink carnations. The groom's attendant was his brother, Edwin Nass, also of Holt. Rev. E. M. Erickson, of Evansville, the bride's grandfather, read the marriage ritual ceremony. The bride was beautifully attired in a white satin gown with full veil, and carried a corsage bouquet of bride's roses and sweet peas. After the marriage vows had been spoken, Mrs. Erickson served a bounteous wedding dinner.

Mrs. Nass, who is the only daughter, of Wm. A. Olson of Battle Lake, is one of the accomplished and successful teachers of Otter Tail County. She graduated from high school with the class of 1924, attended the Normal training school at Fergus Falls one year, and taught school for three years near Balmoral.

The happy couple will go immediatly to housekeeping on a farm near Battle Lake, which the groom has rented this year.

Short Lessons in Dairying

LESSON 59

PRODUCTION: A yield of from 2 to 3 tons of alfalfa hay per season (2 cuttings) is secured from a fair to good stand, A ton of good alfalfa hay is nearly equal to a ton of bran for milk productions. In the West, where alfalfa is extensively grown, some dairy farmers feed only alfalfa hay the year around and get as high as 300 pounds of butterfat per cow average. Alfalfa lasts several years. In most places the seed needs to be inoculated and in some places the soil needs liming, but the crop pays in all cases.

MANUFACTURING: Dairy products may be considered in the manufacturing process from the time the milking begins. Unless special care is taken to be clean in milking, foreign matter will get in the milk that will lower the quality of the product later on, whether the product is consumed as milk, cream, cheese or butter.

MARKETING: The darkest chapter in the history of the Mid-West dairying was when the butter was made on the farms and sold thru the local stores. Not that some good butter was not made, but the good and poor was mixed together, which made it all poor. The price to the producer was from 8 to 15 cents per pound.

Industries Seek to Use Farm Wastes

With paper ranging from coarse wrapping to fine bond being manufactured successfully from corn stalks, industries are turning more and more to farm wastes as a source of raw materials, the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation observes. Likewise, farm leaders are looking to industrial utilization as a means of widening the markets for farm products.

Chemists have produced over 200 different products from corn stalks and a similar number from straw. Corn stalks can be made into wall board at a cost of $16 per 1,000 board feet, even after paying $7 to $8 a ton for stalks at the factory. Rayon, cellulose for explosives, print paper, acetone, and a sugar for diabetics are other products which can be made from corn stalks.

Corn cobs also are a rich source of industrial materials, especially furfural, which is used in making a hard rubber substitute, in an anti-knock for autos, in embalming fluids and in an anesthetic. Cobs also furnish perfumes, fruit flavors and a compound 300 times as sweet as sugar. Most of the commercial supply of furfural is made from oat hulls which accumulate at oat meal factories. Straw furnishes a gas suitable for heating and lighting, vegetable carbon, vegetable pitch, and straw oil.

The work of the packing companies in utilizing wastes of animal slaughter is well known. Casein from skimmilk is used as a coating for special papers, in paints for interior use, in glues, and is made into substances resembling ivory, jade and tortoise shell, much used in fountain pens, buckles, buttons and spectacle frames.

The amount of these farm wastes available for use is tremendous, the Foundation continues. Annual production of corn stalks not used by live stock probably approaches 10 million tons, equal to eight times the total paper consumption in the United States. Straw probably totals well over 100 million tons, and cobs 20 million tons. Cotton stalks, cottonseed hulls, flax stalks, sugar cane bagasse, and peanut hulls are other wastes useful for industry.

Ancient Canal

From an inscription on the temple at Karnak, Egypt, it would appear that a canal joining the River Nile and the Red sea existed in the time of Seti I (1380 B. C.). The channel of this canal is still traceable in parts of the Wadi Tumilat and its direction was frequently followed by the engineers of the fresh-water canal.

Robbers Nabbed

Some boys from Thief River Falls came up here last Friday evening to take in the dance but, found it too tame a sport so they hit upon the idea of stealing gas and auto parts. They helped themselves to the generator, gas, one wheel, tire and chains on the Ford belonging to Obert Reierson and the gas from two other cars.

Someone here saw the boys snooping around Friday evening and told Mr. Reierson who they were and he went to Thief River Falls on Monday and had Sheriff Ihle pick them up. They all admitted the theft and paid for all the articles and costs which amounted to about forty dollars.

ANDY WAS A HERO

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

VIVA LANG suddenly discovered that she had taken seven wrong stitches in her embroidery.

"I was thinking of something else," she said to herself severely. "Now I shall have to take them out, and it is simply disastrous to a piece of fine linen to pick out stitches."

But before she took out the seven misplaced stitches she let the embroidery hoops fall into her lap while she continued her train of thought.

It was still in the large, pleasant living room. Viva's sister, Caroline, had jumped into the brougham and gone shopping soon after lunch. She would not return until dinner time. Viva half wished that she had gone, too, although at the time she preferred to stay at home and work on her embroidery. She was making a wonderful lunchcloth for Caroline and it was difficult to keep the work a secret with her sister in the house.

The discovery of the false stitches was less annoying than the simultaneous discovery that she had been thinking about Andrew Worden.

"I am going to hear something concerning him," she thought with quickening heartbeats.

Three years before she had refused to marry Andrew Worden. She distinctly remembered the scene—how he had whitened and winced when she said:

"Andrew, dear, you're all right enough, but you're not brave. You simply couldn't say 'boo' to a goose. It takes courage to buck the world nowadays. The man I marry must have courage; he must be brave. You aren't. You are good and kind and all that, but you haven't any hero stuff in you, and so I can't marry you."

She pitied him in that moment as he stood looking down at her, his honest face rather haggard, his shoulders sinking as if she had placed too heavy a burden upon them. Yet what she said was apparently true; he had no hero stuff in him. He was kind and gentle and good, but not brave, and she admired brave men.

Caroline said to her rather impressively after that:

"You've turned Andrew down because he doesn't compare with Len Sturtevant. Granted that Len is a hero of the popular order, maybe he won't make any better showing in life than poor old Andy."

Now after three years Caroline had proved herself right in what she had said about Len; he had not made good. The popular idol had failed in ordinary private life, but it was not until he was no longer asked to the houses of his friends that Viva gave up her ideal of him.

And now she was thinking of Andy. Two days after that settlement in which she had called him a coward he had gone to Wyoming and she had never heard from him since.

But she should hear from him; she felt it strongly. Perhaps he was coming back!

"It would be just like him," she thought. "He was simply mad about me."

The doorbell rang and she went in a flutter, half expecting to find him there, but it was her sister.

"I forgot my latch key," Caroline said. She was flushed with outdoor air and looked bright and handsome. Some people there were who thought her even better looking than Viva, although that was not really the case, for Viva's dark eyes gave distinction to her face.

Caroline entered the living-room and sank down upon the davenport.

"Sit down here beside me, Viva," she said. "I've got something to tell you."

"About Andy?" Viva could not keep back the question.

"Yes! How did you know? I ran across his sister, Mrs. Pelk, at Davern's. I haven't seen her in ages. We sat down for a moment in the restroom and she told me about Andy. But you can read for yourself in the papers this evening; it will be out then. She said when the reporter came to interview her about it she had to confess that she hadn't heard one word. Andy is so extremely modest that when he writes his letters he tells very little, but a deed like that—"

"What deed?" Viva's eyes were shining. "Tell me, Caroline," she panted.

"First you must know that Andy is a mail clerk, he gave up the ranch several months ago."

"I didn't know," Viva murmured. She was glad. It had always seemed to her that Andy would be a mere joke as a ranchman.

"Well, the other night when he went into his car he found a bandit there. The bandit covered Andy with a gun and told him to throw up his hands. Then he took Andy's gun away. After that he told Andy to get down on his stomach on the floor, and Andy pretended to be going to do this. For an instant the bandit was thrown off his guard. He was a big man, bigger than Andy. But Andy grabbed his legs quick as lightning and flopped him on the floor. The bandit dropped his gun and Andy had him. Of course, they struggled terribly, but Andy never gave up until he had knocked the senses out of the man. But it horrifies you. You are pale as a ghost."

"No, go on." Viva said tensely.

"That's all. The man was after a great sum of money which he knew was in the mail car—$40,000, I believe. He was a noted robber, and there was a price on his head. Andy got $8,000 for that night's work. He didn't want to take it, but they made him. Eight thousands dollars! And his name traveling from coast to coast as a hero! You ought to write to him and take back what you said to him that day."

Color was coming back into Viva's face.

"I will," she breathed. "Oh, it was wonderful! I never heard of such heroism! How proud his sister must be of him!"

"Proud is no name for it, she is simply delirious," Caroline replied.

"But it would have been better if he had absolutely refused the money. That would have made the act finer," mused Viva. She was thinking of that letter she would write presently to Andy, dear Andy! What a fool she had been to mistake him. All the youth in her fired to the spirit of his achievement.

"But you see," Caroline went on, "he didn't take the money for himself."

"For whom then?" Viva demanded sharply.

Caroline looked the other way.

"Well he felt he ought to take it for—his wife and baby," she said.

There was a silence during which Viva struggled to keep her footing. Then she said in a faint voice:

"He won't care for any letter I could write him now."

Caroline said nothing, but she gripped her sister's hand in sympathy and understanding.

Child Mind Developed by Proper Playthings

That the scholars of the world attach great importance in the study of the playthings and dolls of all times is best demonstrated by a late remarkable volume written in German by Prof. Karl Groeber, in which lies a wealth of information and illustrations dealing with this topic.

The taste of the elders is reflected in the playthings of the children, and the fact that they took the trouble to amuse their children in this fashion and to teach them something of the art of living through their play is in line with modern thought at its best.

The child meant much to the ancients, quite as much as it means to us. They saw play as a means of education, and the toy and doll were part of the equipment. Considering our progress in other directions, we have not advanced greatly beyond their toys, save in the sphere of the mechanical and electric toy. If the ancients knew electricity it was reserved for more sacred purposes.

In studying children's toys it is found that the early Middle ages have preserved little or nothing of the playthings of the children. It is possible that there were some dolls and toys, for children had the same desires then as earlier and later, but the ruthlessness of the Dark ages destroyed all that seemed trifling, and to them it did not seem worth while to keep the toys that had amused the boys and girls. In the constant sieges and burnings of the towns and castles what remained of childish treasures was easily destroyed. Yet a few of the old dolls are found in the graves of their childish owners in Germany and France, and in the romantic age the fact that the toys, consisting of knights and riders, were made of clay tended to their preservation, as these did not fall into decay like wooden toys.

There is much of suggestion for the parents of today in the study of this subject, and the wise parents will be glad to have the help of the right kind of playthings to develop taste and talent in their children. The daily contact of the dolls and toys has a far greater influence upon the mind of the child than much of the school instruction. The ancients can teach us much in this line, if we are willing to learn. The problem of the parent was the same then as now—how to keep the child interested, amused and intelligently impressed through and by the playthings used every day, and all day long.

Favorite Remarks

An editorial friend has compiled a list of favorite remarks at various ages. At fifteen, "Let's go." At twenty, "Give me a chance and I'll show 'em." At twenty-five, "It's all wrong. There must be reform." At thirty, "I'll live to see the dawn of a new day. In a few years the people will wake up and demand their rights." At thirty-five, "I'd be rich if I'd stayed single." At forty, "I'm sick of reformers." At forty-five, "What of it." At fifty, "Thank God, I've got a good bed." At fifty-five, "The human race isn't worth saving." At sixty, "I once believed that." At sixty-five, "It won't work." At seventy, "The world has changed."—New York Republican.

Language Comparisons

A new way of comparing languages has been devised by John Collard of London, England, and he reports that of the four leading European languages, Italian is most easily understood over the telephone, but French is able to carry the largest number of ideas during a one-minute conversation. In intelligibility, the rank is Italian, followed by German, English and French, but in the average time to express ideas the order is French, English, German and Italian. For international telephone use, therefore, English constitutes a reasonable compromise of speed and fair intelligibility.

EXILED SWEDES WANT TO RETURN

Colony on Baltic Hopes to See Native Land.

Stockholm.—After 250 years of exile from their ancestral homeland a Swedish colony which now numbers 800 villagers and farmers of Gammalsvensky in the government of Cherson, southern Russia, has appealed to the Stockholm government to be brought back to Sweden.

Their story is that of a community exiled for centuries yet always dreaming of their homeland, and for generation after generation rigidly maintaining their native schools, language, customs and religion. Their ancestors left Swedish shores about 1670, and for 100 years were settled on the Esthonian island of Dagoe.

In 1781 Empress Catherine II of Russia ordered them to the Ukrainian steppes near the falls of the river Dneiper. Cossacks escorted them on that forced march. Their caravans, like the wagon trains that crossed the western plains of America in the days of '49, crawled 1,200 miles to the new home.

The journey took nine months, and more than half the colonists died on the way. In 1792 the group numbered only 200 persons, according to the cherished church record of the Swedish vicar.

When forefathers of the group left Sweden, Dagoe island and all the Baltic territory belonged to Sweden. The liberties they had enjoyed under Swedish rule were taken from them in 1721 when Russia, expanding toward the sea, took possession of Baltic shores. Russian landowners attempted to force the Swedish settlers into a condition of serfdom.

The Swedes sent deputy after deputy to the empress, and at last, in 1780, succeeded in getting an imperial ukase which defended their rights, a precursor of the liberty granted all Russian peasants 80 years later.

But under the new freedom the colony was ordered to the Ukrainian steppes.

The tenacity with which they have clung to Swedish culture, a record piously preserved in parish Bibles, has aroused deep admiration through Sweden and the government is studying plans to help the Gammalsvensky colony realize its ambitions.

X-Ray Used on Flies to Help Human Race

Washington.—Flies which have long been held in bad esteem as spreaders of disease are about to do their bit in helping the human race. They are being used now for studies of the effect of X-rays on future generations. In flies, the harmful effects of these rays appear in the third and fourth generation, Dr. Mary B. Stark of New York city reported recently. She has exposed flies to X-rays for varying lengths of time.

While the individuals exposed continue to grow and breed, their descendants die off. Doctor Stark believes this is because the reproductive cells of the grandparent or great-grandparent flies were injured by the rays. This injury is inherited and finally causes death. In this same way cancer may be produced in third and fourth generations of flies.

Doctor Stark believes that the experiments on flies will throw some light on this problem in human beings. Her theory is not accepted by all scientists, however. Because the human race breeds slowly, it will be some time before the inherited effects of X-rays can be noticed in man.

Illusions of Romantic East Lost After Trip

Philadelphia. — Three adventuresome young men who recently completed a rapid 14,000-mile tour into the heart of Transjordania, Arabia, and Syria returned with shattered opinions about romantic illusions of the desert.

The travelers—Robert P. Brown of Moorestown, N. J.; Richard A. Tausig and Chester P. McCreery, both of Germantown, Pa.—were entertained by three kings of the Near East.

Dusky beauties of the desert are non-existent, the youthful travelers said. The women, they said, are mere drudges. The bandit tribesmen, instead of sallying forth in gay garments, mounted on beautiful steeds and armed with antiquated guns, now use motor cars and machine guns in their forays, they said.

Finds Way to Color Pictures by Radio

New York.—Color printing of pictures sent by radio is one of the latest laboratory developments.

A new heat sentitive, wax-coated paper has been devised by Frank G. Morehouse of the Radio Corporation of America. A hot-air brush passes over this paper, with air jets actuated by radio. The air jets melt the wax, making a pattern corresponding to the lights and shades on the original photo.

An ink roller run over this pattern brings out the picture instantly and permanently. Mr. Morehouse has arranged a signal code to enable the receiving operator to ink pictures in colors.

TRAIL OF JOAN OF ARC TO BE MARKED

Stone Tablets to Follow Route of Maid.

Vaucouleurs, France.—The trail of Joan of Arc, Maid of Orleans, is to be marked permanently as France's tribute to her on the five-hundredth anniversary celebration of her exploits.

Her progress from the little town of Domremy to the court of the dauphin at Chinon; to Orleans, where she raised the 160-day siege; on to Reims, where she crowned the dauphin, King Charles VII; to St. Denis, close to Paris, and eventually to the stake at Rouen in the north, is to be described serially in stone tablets set up at points of greatest importance in connection with her story. It will take 18 months to put them in place.

Three Thousand Weary Miles.

In all, the trail will cover more than 3,000 weary miles which the girl soldier, clad in armor and riding a white horse, traveled in less than fourteen months of terrific campaigning. She always pushed forward faster than her seasoned warrior counselers advised, never resting or sparing herself.

This little town, a few miles from peaceful Domremy, where Joan, daughter of a landed peasant family, heard the voices which started her on her military career, was the starting point of her journey. The story begins at dawn February 23, 1429, when Joan, disguised as a young merchant and accompanied by six faithful local followers, set out for Chinon and the court of the dauphin, to tell the story of her voices and offer her sword to France.

She rode a white horse, given her by an uncle, and she left her mother and father in angry tears, berating her for her willfulness.

A Big, Healthy Girl.

She was a big, healthy girl of eighteen years of age, strong from working in the fields, tending her father's flock and doing the housework of a medieval peasant cottage. Eighteen months later she met her death, almost too feeble to stand up. War, hardships and imprisonment made a white-faced, hollow-eyed shadow of the peasant girl.

Joan raised the siege of Orleans April 29, 1429. She crowned the dauphin king of France in the Reims cathedral July 16 of the same year. She was taken prisoner at Compiegnes May 24, 1430, and met her death at Rouen May 30, 1431. Dates of dedication of memorial tablets will coincide with the five-hundredth anniversary of these dates.

Woman Is Auctioneer; Husband Is Her Clerk

Bournemouth, England.—When Mrs. Ernest Comer of Christchurch road, Boscombe, mounts the rostrum of one of the leading auction rooms in this town and begins wielding the hammer, dealers sit up and take notice.

For although Mrs. Comer is a pioneer of her sex in the strenuous profession of autioneering, she is acknowledged by male competitors to be one of the cleverest in England. With true womanly intuition she is keen to drive a bargain, and this ability, together with the feminine "gift of gab," has contributed greatly to her success.

Mrs. Comer took up autioneering about ten years ago, when, owing to her husband's illness, she was compelled to become the family bread winner. Mr. Comer now acts as her clerk.

Furniture is Mrs. Comer's specialty, and her husband is an expert on pictures.

"But I have sold motor cars and many other articles by auction with success," she added.

Swede and Finn Barks in Long Ocean Race

Gothenburg, Sweden.—An old-fashioned sailing race from Australia to England has just been begun by a Swedish and a Fnnish bark. The Swedish entry, the Beatrice of Gothenburg, is the last four-masted full-rigger in the Swedish merchant marine. She is 2,106 gross tons. Her competitor is the Herzogin Cecilie, whose home port is Mariehamn on the Aaland island, in the Baltic sea. The distance from Port Lincoln, the starting point of the race, to Plymouth is approximately 15,000 nautical miles.

Last year the same vessels engaged in a similar race between these two cities, at which time the Herzogin Cecilie won, arriving 18 days ahead of the Swedish boat.

Plane to Map Route in Native Australia

Sydney, Australia.—One of the last remaining unexplored sections of the earth outside polar regions, a section of Australia about the size of England, is about to be opened up by airplane.

The plane will map the route which explorers later will follow. Aerial observations will determine whether the caravan shall attempt to travel with camels, on foot or otherwise.

It is said that no white man yet has set his foot in this territory, which is the southeastern corner of central Australia. The expedition, now being organized, is sponsored by the Royal Geographical Society of South Australia.

RIVALS FICTION'S GREAT SLEUTHS

Detective Never Read Doyle, but Gets His Man.

Canton, Ohio.—Ora Slater never read Sherlock Holmes nor heard of S. S. Van Dine, but he is a detective of fictional qualities just the same.

Slater has figured prominently in three famous Ohio murder mysteries. He solved the Nesbitt case at Troy a few years ago, and later conducted the investigation of the mysterious shooting of Don Mellett, the Canton publisher.

One of his recent cases was in connection with the death of Margaret Heldman, twenty-year-old wife of a Lorain furnace salesman. Wilbur O. Heldman, her husband, was charged with the murder.

Tracks Down Every Clew.

Slater's method of solving homicide mysteries is to trace down every clew, question every possible suspect, search minutely for a loophole—he says there always is one—and then peer long and patiently through the loophole.

The detective gained a local distinction in Indiana, his native state, handling investigations for the government during the World war. Afterward he became a private detective in Cincinnati.

One morning Mrs. Jake Nesbitt, young Ohio State university graduate, was found beaten to death in her Troy home. Jake helped the officers seek the slayer, at first believed to be a vagrant. Slater was called in. Nesbitt said he slept at home the night before the murder. The lower portion of his pajamas could not be found. That was Slater's loophole.

Caught by Loss of Pajamas.

Jake eventually confessed the murder. He had burned the pajama trousers after killing his wife during a quarrel.

In the Mellett murder Slater faced a blank wall until a mysterious telephone call from Massillon, later traced to Ben Rudner, convicted as the "pay off" man in the plot, provided the loophole.

Slater is a long-distance talker and a story teller of interest. Often he has disarmed a suspect merely by talking him into security.

Students' Signs Lead to Color Discovery

Troy, N. Y.—The rapid fading of flaming colors on student athletic signs here has led to the discovery of an entirely new set of fast colors at Rensselaer Polytechnic institute.

The man who made the new colors is Dr. F. W. Schwartz, professor of analytical chemistry, whose interest was stirred by the sorry appearance that exposure gave to campus signs. As a chemist he knew that fading of colors is caused by ultra-violet rays of light, and he set out to find a base that would produce printing ink colors but resist these rays.

He found this base in thorium, one of the elements which are the fundamental substances of which all known earthly matter is composed. Thorium is used in making ordinary incandescent gas mantles. He experimented with thorium because it is related closely to elements from which colors ordinarily have been made.

The better durability of the new colors is established by tests with concentrated ultra-violet rays, whereby in the laboratory it is possible to produce in about ten minutes the equivalent of a week's exposure to bright daylight.

The colors are in the form of metallic powders, of every shade of the rainbow. Samples of them in small bottles are mounted in a row on a large, white plaque. In a parallel row are similar bottles filled with some of the color powders now in commercial use, which fade more rapidly. To the eye the rows are exactly similar, except as they may differ in tone.

Although these colors were designed for use in printing inks, Doctor Schwartz says they may be used for fabrics such as silks and cottons.

Logs Found Under Lava Flow 500 Feet Thick

Pasco, Wash.—Where sagebrush now covers the plains about White Swan in the Yakima River valley, centuries ago a dense forest grew, according to evidence brought up recently by a well-drilling machine.

At a depth of 500 feet on the farm of H. E. Kent, the drill encountered pieces of wood, either spruce or hemlock. The ancient forest was buried beneath a flood of lava and ashes which covered this region when Mt. Rainier and other coast peaks were in action.

Tattooing Days Gone Except for Sailors

Norfolk, Va.—The popularity of tattooing is waning. This is the opinion of the needle and ink artists who follow the trade here.

"Tattooing has seen its best days," one veteran holds. "The late czar of Russia was tattooed and there was a time when many society folk took to it, but now ou [illegible] is confined chiefly to sail [illegible] he veteran needleman h [illegible] eople get tattooed becaus [illegible] are still savages undern [illegible] nd they like to get themse [illegible] up to look pretty."

It May Be Urgent

When your Children Cry for It

Castoria is a comfort when Baby is fretful. No sooner taken than the little one is at ease. If restless, a few drops soon bring contentment. No harm done, for Castoria is a baby remedy, meant for babies. Perfectly safe to give the youngest infant; you have the doctors' word for that! It is a vegetable product and you could use it every day. But it's in an emergency that Castoria means most. Some night when constipation must be relieved—or colic pains—or other suffering. Never be without it; some mothers keep an extra bottle, unopened, to make sure there will always be Castoria in the house. It is effective for older children, too; read the book that comes with it.

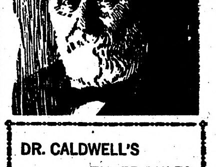
No Change in Menu

Blinks—My wife spends more time in the kitchen since I bought her that rainbow range.

Jinks—Getting some real eats now, I suppose.

Blinks—No, she's simply out there showing it off to her friends.



DR. CALDWELL'S THREE RULES

Dr. Caldwell watched the results of constipation for 47 years, and believed that no matter how careful people are of their health, diet and exercise, constipation will occur from time to time. Of next importance, then, is how to treat it when it comes. Dr. Caldwell always was in favor of getting as close to nature as possible, hence his remedy for constipation is a mild vegetable compound. It can not harm the most delicate system and is not habit forming.

The Doctor never did approve of drastic physics and purges. He did not believe they were good for human beings to put into their system. Use Syrup Pepsin for yourself and members of the family in constipation, biliousness, sour and crampy stomach, bad breath, no appetite, headaches, and to break up fevers and colds. Get a bottle today, at any drugstore and observe these three rules of health: Keep the head cool, the feet warm, the bowels open. For a free trial bottle, just write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. BB, Monticello, Illinois.

Tree for Every Baby

As an investment for their children, 11 men of Cooperstown, N. Y., are reforesting a tract to be called the "Forest of a Dozen Dads." In southern Italy, fathers plant a row of trees for each of their girls when they are babies. By the time the girls grow up the trees are big enough to cut and sell. The money goes into the girl's dowry. The result is more girl babies and more trees, ad infinitum.—Capper's Weekly.

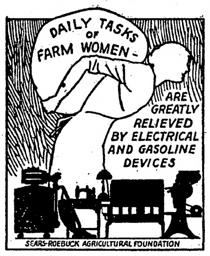
Labor-Saving Equipment Is Coming to the Farm Home

Labor-saving and health-conserving equipment found in the modern city residence is gradually coming into use in the farm home, where it is most needed, and is revolutionizing the daily tasks of the farm housewife, the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation observes.

With the advent of electric power secured either from individual power plants, central stations, or transmission lines, the farm wife has been able to use the electricity driven washing machine, sadiron, vacuum cleaner, churn, cream separator, and other energy-saving devices. Hand sweepers, washing machines, separators, sewing machines, canners, bread mixers and the like have relieved the drudgery on farms where electric power in not available.



DAILY TASKS OF FARM WOMEN -
ARE GREATLY RELIEVED BY ELECTRICAL AND GASOLINE DEVICES
SEARS-ROEBUCK AGRICULTURAL FOUNDATION

In the farm kitchen, the kerosene or gasoline stove or electric range have done away with much of the discomfort of working over a hot coal range. Fireless cookers give many a farm-wife an occasional afternoon off or help her get to church on Sunday mornings. Acetylene or gasoline mantle lamps or electric lights are replacing the kerosene lamp, giving better light and easing the labor of cleaning lamp chimneys.

In a survey of forty thousand farm homes in forty-six states, conducted by the General Federation of Women's clubs, it was found that 71.8 per cent had sewing machines; 51.5 per cent, food choppers; 50.1 per cent, refrigeration of some kind; 44.6 per cent, water piped to the house; 40.3 per cent, washing machines; 30.5 per cent, kerosene or gasoline stoves; 24.6 per cent, electric or gas sadirons, and 17.3 per cent, vacuum cleaners. While this group of homes may not have been entirely typical, the survey does indicate that hundreds of thousands of farm homes are becoming equipped with labor-saving devices, the Foundation adds.

Give Her A Chance To Grow Up

A chick is the quickest maturing live farm machine and one of the best earners. She isn't really profitable until she begins to lay. But from the time she is two days old until she is coming into pullethood she must have the food elements that make her a good layer or she will never be profitable except as dressed poultry. Sterling Chick Mash and Chick Feed make it easy for anyone to properly feed chicks.

Spring Showing of General Motors Cars.

This week, throughout America, the public is viewing the newest models of General Motors products. Check and mail the coupon below. It will bring this Spring Showing into your own home.

CHEVROLET—Last year the public bought more than 1,000,000 Chevrolets. This enabled Chevrolet and General Motors to effect one of the most remarkable feats in industrial history: almost overnight, Chevrolet was changed from a 4-cylinder car to a Six in the price range of the four. The new Chevrolet Six is new in every respect: smoother, more powerful, and luxurious bodies by Fisher.
7 models—$525 to $725

PONTIAC—Since General Motors introduced the Pontiac Six three years ago, its sales have practically doubled each year. Now General Motors offers, in the new Pontiac, a "Big six," at the same base price. It has big-car power, big-car performance and big-car luxury in the Bodies by Fisher. It is appealing particularly to families which are "stepping up" in car ownership. 7 models—$745 to $895

OLDSMOBILE—General Motors took this long-established car and remade it to provide a fine car at low price. Last year the value of Oldsmobile was so marked that the public bought over 50 per cent more than the year before. The new Oldsmobile models, with Bodies by Fisher, offer still further improvements — and the prices have been reduced! Oldsmobile also has new Special and De Luxe models, with extra features, at slightly higher prices.
7 models—$875 to $1035

OAKLAND—General Motors' policy of continuous improvement is nowhere more noticeable than in the new models of the Oakland All-American Six. The distinctive style and advanced engineering principles which Oakland represents have made it a center of unusual public interest at automobile shows. All-American in name, the new Oakland is All-American in its qualities of speed, snap, power and stamina. Fisher makes the bodies.
8 models—$1145 to $1375

VIKING—There was demand for an 8-cylinder car of General Motors quality in the medium price field. General Motors chose Oldsmobile to design and build the new car, and three years were spent in its development and test. The result was revealed last month in the Viking, the latest member of the General Motors family. Viking has the world-famous 90-degree V-type engine and Fisher's newest creations in bodies. 3 models—$1595

Municipal Opera

AS AN experiment as well as to have a delightful place for folks to go for uplifting entertainment on warm nights, a group of St. Louisans, in 1919, hit upon the idea of constructing an open-air municipal theater in a great natural park which since has become a mecca for music and opera lovers.

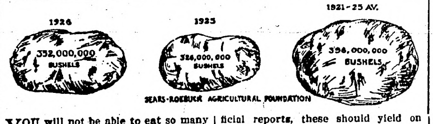
"The open-air Municipal Opera of St. Louis," declared a New York visitor, "is a bit of Mittel Europa set down in our American Midwest. It is strangely exotic and yet it fits into Forest park like a lady's hand in a well-made glove."

The meandering little River Des Peres (often jokingly referred to as the River Despair), floored over, made a stage of generous proportions. A group of lovely trees provided a background; two huge oaks rising through the flooring completed this lovely, nature-made setting. An orchestra pit was arranged and lighting effects capable of producing scenes of fairy-like loveliness installed. A convenient, curving hillside which slopes down to the stage was lined with seemingly endless rows of seats and the ensemble was complete.

A 40-piece orchestra provides the music and the chorus is made up of some 96 picked St. Louis boys and girls, some of whom have been heard at the New York Metropolitan opera house, and took part in the cast.

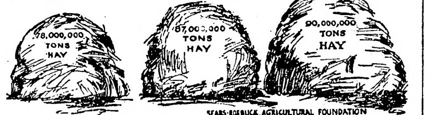
There are 7,613 reserved and 1,600 free seats, with standing room for 2,000 additional visitors. The season is for 12 weeks, starting about June 1. On one evening during the 1926 season, 11,000 persons crowded themselves into the enclosure and 5,000 more were turned away—65,000 came in one week.

Spuds Are Scarce Again



YOU will not be able to eat so many potatoes this year and on an average you will have to pay more for what you eat, according to the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. While there will be 25,000,000 bushels more potatoes than last year, the prospective crop of 352,000,000 bushels is still 50,000,000 short of the five-year average. Farmers devoted 3,202,000 acres to potatoes this year, the Foundation finds, and according to the latest official reports, these should yield on the average 110 bushels per acre. In 1925 the yield was only 103.9, while in 1924 it was 127 bushels. The present prospects are for a crop 15 per cent below normal. Based on studies over a period of 23 years, the Department of Agriculture indicated that prices will be about 37.5 per cent above normal, and while prices are expected to be higher, the extreme high prices of a year ago are not likely.

Less Hay on Cattle Menu



THERE will be less hay on the livestock menu this year, due to the short hay crop, says the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. Farmers will produce only 78,900,000 tons, because of the unfavorable weather. Last year they produced 87,000,000 tons, and the five-year average crop is 90,000,000 tons, the Foundation points out. It is true that there are fewer live stock to consume this year's hay crop. Most of the crop is eaten by cattle. Horses and sheep also require large quantities. This year farmers devoted 59,080,000 acres to tame hay crops, such as alfalfa, clover, timothy and mixed crops. This is a slight reduction from last year's acreage. This is expected to yield 1.34 tons per acre, a smaller yield than usual.

What the Gray House Hid

The Mystery of a Haunted Mansion

by Wyndham Martyn

W. N. U. Service
Copyright by Wyndham Martyn

THE STORY

Hilton Hanby, prosperous New York merchant, has purchased a country place—the Gray house, near Pine Plains. Miss Selenos, a former tenant of the Gray house, calls at his office and warns him that the house is under a curse. Further alarming details are impressed upon Adolf Smucker, Hanby's secretary, by a man who claims to have been chauffeur for Sir Stanford Seymour, former occupant of the place.

"Julius Caesar was a small man," he said suddenly, much to his host's amazement. "So was Napoleon. So is Lloyd George." He bent over the table, as if imparting a profound secret. "So was the master of them all—my idol, Lenin." Mr. Smucker touched his receding forehead with a dramatic gesture. "Don't think, because you are twice as big, that you can outmatch me here!"

Again he smote his brow.

"That's all right," said the other pacifically. "Benny Leonard ain't a big man, and I guess he's pretty good. So was the baby that steered Black Sand and won one thousand iron men for daddy. You wouldn't be where you are today if you hadn't got the gray matter. Say, do you believe in haunted houses?"

"I don't believe in haunted houses," Smucker asserted, "nor in the immortality of the soul. I'm away beyond that religious bunk!"

"I didn't believe in haunted houses when I first went up there with Mr. Seymour. I was like you—conceited—bone-headed. I thought I knew it all and then some." The stranger had a cold and compelling eye. He looked at Mr. Smucker in a way that dispelled many of the secretary's theories. He leaned over the table. "It's fine and dandy to hold them beliefs when you ain't been put to the test!"

"I don't get you," said Mr. Smucker irritably.

"You will," said the other simply. "I used to be chauffeur for Mr. Seymour up at the Gray house. His two kids died up there. There's a curse on that place. The man that had it before lost his wife. Nothing the matter with her until she went up to Dutchess county. Bo, there's something in the lake there that calls people to it. The man who had it after Seymour and me was warned. Seymour said he went there on his own responsibility. I'll say Seymour was square about warning him. Well, sir, that man was found drowned in that d—d lake. The doctors couldn't find a thing the matter, except he was drowned. It's a bad place to live in. I know! I was there for two years."

The stranger's voice sank to a whisper.

"You feel like people are watching you all the time," he went on. "When you wake up, you think there's people at the foot of your bed, and when you switch on the light it seems like you catch them going away out of the tail of your eye. The help won't stay there. They know! Mr. Seymour—he's a lord or something now—brought out an old cook from England. She went bughouse from what she saw."

"Do you expect me to believe that?" Smucker said.

"No," said the other. "You ain't got the education to understand. Mr. Hanby may. All I ask you to do, if you want to keep your job, is to try and prevent him from taking his family up there to live."

Smucker bitterly resented the strictures on his education. He thought of many cutting things to say, but words did not come easily. His brain seethed with brilliant stillborn speeches. After a time he gathered his wits together.

"It amounts to this," he said. "You want me to warn Hanby before it's too late."

"I don't give a d—n whether you do or not," returned the stranger. "I've got it off my conscience. If you want them to go to their death, it's up to you. Any man taking his family there is killing 'em, just as much as if he fed 'em strychnine in their soup. What do I get for this? Not a d—n thing! I'm out a dinner."

"That," said Smucker quickly, "is your own financial liability."

"I'm no piker," said the other. "Hey, Pat, bring a couple of them cigars that Morgan smokes, and some black coffee. My friend here has an important date."

CHAPTER II

At nine o'clock Mr. Smucker stood outside the Gothic entrance of the building where Hilton Hanby maintained a duplex apartment. Mr. Smucker was in an unusual frame of mind. Whereas his viewpoint was often confused, and his rebellion a silent one, he now saw things with a dreadful clarity. He was vocal. He told the subway guard that ere long those who cheerfully wore the livery of oppressing capitalists would be offered the opportunity to revolt. If they refused, they would toil in deep mines, abject serfs of an emancipated proletariat.

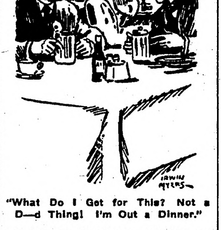
When the liveried elevator starter at the Hanby apartment house intercepted Mr. Smucker and desired to know his business, the Weehawken philosopher saw in this precaution only another instance of the tyranny of the rich; and when, after some delay, he was shown into his employer's rooms, he was overripe for speech. The girl who opened the door looked at him coldly as she demanded his name.

"Tell Hanby, Smucker is here!" he said loudly. "A. Smucker!"

"I asked your name, not what you were," she retorted.

"My name is Smucker—Adolf Smucker—and Hanby has to see me at once!"

He was shown into a small room, which led, as investigation proved, to a gallery running along one side of the apartment. Below him was a spacious drawing-room. Through an arched opening Smucker could see a party of diners. Dining, and it was past nine o'clock!



"What Do I Get for This? Not a D—d Thing! I'm Out a Dinner."

This, then, was what a duplex apartment meant. The Smuckers had never been quite sure. They were certain only that it was a symptom of the criminal extravagance of the untaxed rich, won at the cost of the workers.

"Old Smucker here?" Hanby exclaimed. "Are you sure?" He turned to his wife. "Dina, do you hear that? Smucker from the office is here."

"That odious little man! Well, he won't mind waiting until we have finished. You'd better send him a cocktail or something. You can't leave us, just as you are going to spring this great surprise." Dina Hanby turned to one of the servants.

"Mary, ask Mr. Smucker to be kind enough to wait, and ask if he'd like a cocktail. See if he will leave a message."

Mr. Smucker looked at the cocktail greedily. Some day pretty girls like this one in neat black and white should bring him cocktails when he thirsted; but they should not sneer at him. If they sneered, they should be lashed.

"Mr. Hanby asks you to wait," said Mary Sloan, not softening the blow. "He's busy. They're in the middle of dinner."

"At half past nine?"

"That's what I said, Mr. Mucker."

"Smucker, Smucker!"

"As he won't be through yet awhile, Mr. Smuckersmucker, do you want to send a message?"

"No!" the man roared. "I won't! Absolutely I will not! Tell him and his wife I come on a matter of life and death. Tell him to leave his boon companions for a moment, and he will go back to them a saddened man!"

With the possible exception of Adolph Smucker, Hanby had not an enemy in the world. His children adored him, and his help remained until removed by marriage or death. Mary hurried back. She was interested in the announcement her employer was about to make. He was on his feet when she reached the dining room.

"Family and friends!" he began. "Best of families, best of friends! I stand before you tonight at the ripe age of four and forty. I have not only an announcement to make—I have also a confession. I have concealed my name from even my wife. You have hitherto known me as plain Hilton Hanby."

"Not exactly plain," his wife laughed. "I could never have married a plain man!"

"Best of wives!" he murmured. "I have deceived you. Almost half a century ago my mother was drowning in one of our picturesque rivers. A handsome stranger sprang in and rescued her. Later they were married, and her first son she called by the name of that superb stream. My true name is Housatonic Hilton Hanby. At school I was known as Tonic. At college they called me Tony. When I married I dropped the name because my wife was from Cleveland, and would not have understood. Tonight I resume it publicly. There are reasons. I am now lord of the manor. I have territorial obligations. Boys and girls, I have been a hard worker, and I have prospered. Fifteen years ago, when I was young in the woolen business, I took, in payment of a bad debt, sixty acres of land near Los Angeles."

"And you've struck oil there?" asked Celia, his eldest daughter.

"No—this is a true story. I have subdivided what was formerly a rocky, goat-infested hill. It is now Wyldwood, famous as the queen of hillside residential parks."

"Dream on!" said Junior, Hanby's son, who was a Yale sophomore, and therefore given to doubting the enthusiasms of his elders.

"No dream, my worthless lad, but a fact! I have the money. Half of it I have spent this afternoon. Know, beloved ones, that I have realized the ambitions of a lifetime. About a hundred miles away, near the peaceful village of Pine Plains, Housatonic H. Hanby owns a lordly estate. In this historic home, this feudal fastness, he will dispense hospitality of the sort his position entails. On his private golf course his friends will pry gobs of turf from their beds as they now do weekly at Wykagyl and Garden City. On his tennis courts, grass and concrete, his children will play under his able tutelage, until they go in triumph to Forest Hills. There Sir Housatonic has a lake, wherein bass and trout await the anglers' fly. There his children will find a swimming pool—not yet built, however—which will make the best that Pasadena and Hollywood have to offer look like frog ponds."

"Oh, dad!" Celia cried. "Is this real, or do we wake up now?"

In answer he passed photographs around. The Gray house was a fact, not a mere hope.

"Wonderful!" said Mrs. Bishop, one of Dina's close friends. "But the help problem in a thirty-room house is appalling. You won't get any one to stay."

"Mary!" Hanby called out. The girl was arranging glasses in the anteroom. "You heard what I've been saying?"

Mary flushed a little.

"I couldn't help it, sir," she apologized.

"Go and ask the others if they'll come to the Gray house."

"They'll come," said Mary eagerly.

"Ask them," Mrs. Bishop commanded. "New York help simply hates the country. We tried it out, and we know."

Mary came back.

"They're crazy to go, sir."

"I don't know how you do it," said Mrs. Bishop.

"It's easy," said Hanby. "We treat 'em as if they were human."

Hanby started as a strange but somehow familiar voice broke in.

"They gave a feast the night before Waterloo!" shouted the voice, from the distant balcony.

"It's that Mucker," Mary said. "The idea!"

"Smucker," Hanby corrected. "I had forgotten all about him. Tell him I'll be there in a moment."

"He's got his nerve!" said Junior. "Besides, the people who gave the feast before Waterloo won the battle. Dad, I hate that man! I wish you'd fire him. Whenever I go to the office, he tries to head me off from seeing you."

"He wishes to save me money," said Hanby, rising.

Mary descended wrathfully on Smucker. He was conscious that his intellectual superiority was lost on her. In the slangy, expressive phrase of her class, she gave Smucker her opinion of him.

Speedometer in Use Long Before "Autos"

It may surprise those complacent people who think that everything that counts was invented within the last century, to hear that speedometers—and they seem pretty modern devices—were brought into use centuries ago. Admittedly they did not tell, by themselves, the rate at which you were taveling, but with a clock hung alongside them you could make a guess good enough for olden days, when speed limits and police traps were unknown.

Evelyn, in his diary, writes in 1657: "I went to see Colonel Blount, who showed me the application of the waywiser to a coach, exactly measuring the miles and showing them by an index as we went on. It had three circles, one pointing to the number of rods, another to the miles, by 10 to 1,000, with all the subdivisions of quarters; very pretty and useful."

What would Evelyn have said if he could have foreseen the pace the modern speedometer has to register, when holiday makers race home and tell the magistrate, a few days later, they were doing 15 miles an hour?—Continental Edition, London Daily Mail.

World's Oldest House?

An architect's drawing, believed to be by far the oldest in the world, discovered in Mesopotamnia, is described by Dr. J. Stur, a Viennese engineer. This four-thousand-year-old equivalent of a blue-print was in fragmentary condition, but three of the pieces fit accurately together, showing part of the ground plan of what must have been a very large house. The walls and doorways for 17 rooms are indicated by accurately and cleanly-drawn lines, and cuneiform notes give the dimensions. The largest room was 40 by 46 feet, and the scale of the drawing is 1 to 360.—Science Service.

Late Seeding Poor Business

Late seeding is one of the most frequent causes of loss in farm production, says Secretary G. W. Connell, of the Minnesota Wheat Pool.

Late seeded grain crops germinate quickly and develop a shallow root system which cannot withstand dry weather. Such crops develop a shorter weaker stem, do not stool well, and as a rule shoot a short head or one that is not well filled.

If a short spell of dry weather occurs when the grain is heading as is often the case, the crop yield is cut to a point where the crop becomes an expense and not a profit.

Rather than plant a crop unseasonably late, why not turn to a crop that is still in planting time? Millet in place of late sown barley, or flax rather than late potatoes or corn?

Eighteen Years Old

With this issue the News is starting on its nineteenth year. Some of those years may have seemed long and hard but, are now over with and are left behind in the dim past. We wish to say that we have enjoyed the patronage given us by loyal supporters of local institutions and hope that our service to you all has been such that, we may again merit your support,

The Publisher.

Last week we published an item telling about the Christianson Brothers and Elmer Engstrom going out to Montana in a house on wheels. The last report we had from them was that they had gotten lost on a trail in the bad lands one night. They kept on going until their Ford-house stalled on a steep hill and rolled back dropping over a 100 foot cliff, reducing it to nothing.

The boys jumped when things started to go backwards, and are now making their way on foot.

Mr. and Mrs. Hans Wahlin and family, Mr. and Mrs. Sam Lorentson and family motored to Crookston on Saturday evening for an over Sunday visit at the home of Mr. and Mrs. P. L. Anderson.

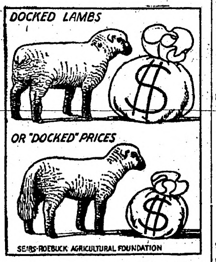
Docked Lambs Avoid Docked Prices

Failure to dock lambs and to desex ram lambs results in discounts of $1 to $3 in price, yet these operations are neglected every year with hundreds of thousands of lambs, especially in the Middle West, the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation points out.

A lamb's tail is a symbol of neglect and warns the buyer of a probable lack of finish. It serves no useful purpose and is objectionable in every way.

Ram lambs which are altered early will gain faster, use less feed, finish more readily and handle more easily than if left entire. Ram lambs tend to be heavier in the neck and shoulder than wether lambs, are lighter in the hind quarters, not as well finished in the carcass and coarser-meated. Lambs which have been docked and castrated have an outlet as feeders if sold before they are finished.



Both operations may be done at the same time when the lambs are ten to fourteen days old. Using hot pinchers appears to be the best method of docking. A bench with an upright containing a hole through which the lamb's tail is drawn is used. The job may be done also with a sharp knife.

Benzine for Beetles

To clear beetles out of cupboards and larders, sprinkle a little benzine over the boards. It will kill the eggs, as well as the insects.

Give Her A Chance To Grow Up

A chick is the quickest maturing live farm machine and one of the best earners. She isn't really profitable until she begins to lay. But from the time she is two days old until she is coming into pullethood she must have the food elements that make her a good layer or she will never be profitable except as dressed poultry. Sterling Chick Mash and Chick Feed make it easy for anyone to properly feed chicks.

Short Lessons in Dairying

LESSON 60

PRODUCTION: A shortage of good farm grown feed results in underfed cows or big feed bills. Alfalfa for hay and sweet clover for pasture seeded this spring will bring more and better feed for 1929. Sweet clover doubles and triples the amount of pasture per acre. Divide the pasture this spring and plow up half and seed to barley and sweet clover—15 pounds per acre. Next year this half of the pasture will give more feed if a good catch is secured than the whole common pasture would. Sweet clover needs to be changed each year.

MANUFACTURING: With co-operative creameries the farmers are manufacturers and the quality of product manufactured is their loss or gain. Thus it is that attention given to producing fine sweet cream on the farm that pays. A milking machine is a great labor savor, but if it is not kept clean it results in poor butter and a loss in price.

MARKETING: Before co-operative creameries were in use the renovating of farm butter in large market centers to which farm butter was shipped was a good business.

Spotting Seals Is This Flyer's Task

Canadian Aviator Scouts Sea to Locate Prey for Hunters.

Toronto.—Colin S. Caldwell, well-known Ottawa aviator, is now on his way to the icy waters of Newfoundland and Labrador to engage in probably the most unusual commercial flying in the world. This is his fifth season working with the Newfoundland sealing fleets, flying over the sealing grounds to spot seals and inform the different boats in the fleet of their position.

Pilot Caldwell lived in Alabama but in 1917 came to Ottawa to join the Royal Flying corps. He trained at Camp Borden but did not get his chance to go overseas. Then he decided on two things, that flying was to be his profession and that Canada was to be his home.

He was one of the first flyers to go on air expeditions into the new mining regions of northern Ontario and Quebec. He has flown to Alaska and visited most of the wilds of Canada on commercial flying ventures. He is acknowledged to be one of the best of Canadian birdmen.

The "We" of Newfoundland.

Caldwell and his small machine are the "We" of Newfoundland and Labrador. He is the only pilot in the world who has ever engaged in the trade which he calls spotting seals, and is the only airman who has spent any length of time flying off the coasts of Newfoundland and Labrador in the winter months when vast fields of ice stretch in every direction. He operates from land bases during the entire season.

Round the coast of Newfoundland are dotted little telegraph stations which keep the Indian and Eskimo villages in touch with civilization. At each of these stations the sealing companies during the summer months have deposited supplies of non-perishable food and gasoline. Caldwell works from them all, going from one to the other as the season progresses. From the station he flies out over the frozen ocean for a hundred or two hundred miles spotting patches of seals lying on the bergs and then returning to the land base.

By reckoning the distance from the base to where he sighted the seals considering the direction in which he has flown he knows exactly where the seals are located, and he marks their position on a chart divided into numbered and lettered sections. On returning to the telegraph station he wires the locations to headquarters at St. John's, Newfoundland. From headquarters the directions are wirelessed to every ship of the sealing fleet. Each captain has a chart similar to Caldwell's and they can place the location of the seals almost exactly.

Also Gives Ice Conditions.

Then there is a wild rush, and competition is keen. Each ship gets the news at the same time. Steam is got up and there is a mad race to the position of the seals.

It is through Caldwell's directions that expense to the companies is saved, for in the old days the ships had to leave two or three weeks earlier than at present, in order to seek out the seals for themselves. Risk is likewise lessened because the flyer can also give ice conditions.

For six or seven weeks the flyer leads a lonely life. He makes headquarters for four or five days at each telegraph station. These are sub-Arctic posts, bleak and desolate. Every day, unless the weather is too bad, he makes a flight and perhaps two or three.

Until last season Caldwell used a historic plane. It was the "Antarctic Baby," a small Avron, which was built for Shackleton for his South pole expedition, but never used. The machine used by the flyer now is a small Avron-Avion with an open cockpit, a cruising radius of 500 miles and cruising speed of about ninety miles an hour. The old Shackleton plane is now lying at St. Johns.

Fires Self From One Job to Hold Another

Fort Scott, Kan.—To fire himself from one office in order to reinstate himself in another, from which he was technically removed, was the experience of D. R. Lang, county attorney. The state's attorney general advised Lang that by accepting a temporary commission as under sheriff he unwittingly had vacated the county attorneyship. Lang dismissed himself as under sheriff and by court permission was reinstated as county attorney.

New Hampshire Man Owns Oldest Piano

Portsmouth, N. H.—Charles W. Gray of this city has the distinction of being the owner of the oldest piano in the United States.

The instrument, which has attracted much attention, was built in London in 1763 by Johann Zampe, inventor of the grand piano. In 1784 it was brought to the United States for John Jacob Astor. During the long passage across the ocean it was with difficulty that the strings were kept from rusting. After its arrival in New York, the much dryer atmosphere caused the woodwork to crack.

For nearly forty years the piano remained in the Astor family. Then it went into the possession of the father of the late G. Alexander Emery of Boston. On the death of Mr. Emery, Sr., the piano passed to his son, and on his removal from Boston to this city he took the highly treasured instrument with him. Upon the death of Mr. Emery, more than twenty-five years ago, the piano was purchased by Mr. Gray. The piano is still in a good state of preservation.

Four-Horse Team Nets Fierce 1,350-lb. Turtle

Port Arthur, Texas.—A. Wiltze, a fisherman, hitched four horses to a seine recently and dragged a 1,350-pound turtle from the Gulf of Mexico. The turtle, whose protective shell had been cut, perhaps by a ship's propeller, put up a hard fight before the horses finally won. It was estimated to be more than three hundred years old.

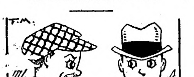
AS A MAN THINKS



Cake-Eater—"Your thoughts are all rude! As a man thinks so he is, you know." Roughneck (with look of contempt)—"Well, in dat case, you ain't—see?"

Ouch!

Wife—I haven't a thing to wear to that party we have been invited to.

Hub—Well, here's $50, and for heaven's sake go get something. You aren't built to go as Lady Godiva.

That Is Why

"How much do you charge for English lessons?"

"Five marks is my regular rate."

"Won't you teach my daughter for 3 marks?"

"No, you must remember that I am English born."

"That is why—it didn't cost you anything to learn English."

Encouraging

He—I suppose it would be quite improper for me to kiss you on such short acquaintance.

She—Yes, but it's quite early in the evening yet.

Co-Eds Adopt Rules to Woo Popularity

Seattle, Wash.—Necking is frowned on by co-eds of the University of Washington, but they see "no harm in kissing a boy friend of whom they are particularly fond."

This interesting attitude was disclosed in the "ten commandments of popularity" adopted by a group of co-eds.

Sex appeal comes first, they agreed, but after that, what makes a girl popular? So they listed their ten commandments:

1. Always be a "lady."
2. Use good taste in selecting your clothes and do not let actions belie that taste.
3. Always be a good sport. Do what the majority wants, but not to the detriment of your own convictions and ideals.
4. Play bridge, tennis, golf, swim, and dance. If not all, then do these two certainly—play bridge and dance.
5. Read the papers. Know your current events, politics, and athletics. It is well to converse on serious topics as well as light ones.
6. Handing a "line" is helpful. Even if you are not the type, this "you-great-big-wonderful-boy" stuff does get over, when used in moderation, of course.
7. Do not neck. If a girl is charming and peppy enough to interest a boy she need not worry about being the gold-digger type.
8. Do not kiss promiscuously. There is no harm in kissing a boy friend of whom you are particularly fond.
9. Dress attractively, but not necessarily expensively. A boy notices the general effect you produce, so be as pretty as you can.
10. First, last, and always—Be FEMININE.

Giant Airships Will Carry 50 Passengers

Dallas, Texas.—Giant airships with cabin accommodations for fifty or more passengers will be an accomplished fact within the next five years, H. J. McNally, general traffic manager for the Universal Aviation Corporation of Chicago, said while in Dallas to establish a southwestern traffic department for his company.

According to McNally, the giant airplanes of the future will have a wing spread of 300 to 400 feet. The present cabin plane and fuselage, which offers surface resistance to flight, will be eliminated, he predicts.

"A normal cruising speed of 300 or more miles per hour is probable. The airplane manufacturing plants are turning out larger and larger engines. The size of the future plane will only be limited by the power provided by the motors. We are now carrying hundreds of gallons of gasoline and hundreds of pounds of baggage in the wings and the possibility of also carrying passengers there, thus eliminating the cabin, is a mathematical one."

Find Egypt's Wise Men Used Magnifying Glass

London.—When the eyesight of Egypt's wise men grew feeble from study they used magnifying glasses to make the stone tablets and papyrus rolls easier to read. This is indicated by pieces of round glass from Egypt, one of which, now in the Ashmolean collection, may date back to the first dynasty of Egypt, or about 3500 B. C. That magnifying glasses were known in the famous civilization of Crete about 1200 B. C. had been shown by two crystal lenses discovered in the Cretan ruins.

BLUEBEARD'S BALL AND THE THIEF

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

CLAIRE had entered the employ of Cliff Dorrance with high hopes. She had read every book and pamphlet on efficiency and the value of strict obedience to orders and had expected to make quick strides in the business world. She hadn't though. Her first position had been barely held.

"Old crab," she muttered unwisely, forgetting the first rule of maintaining mental poise at all times. "Sometimes I just think I'll give him notice."

A slow grin overspread the face of the office boy, Jimmy, and Claire had the unpleasant conviction that he'd heard her. She knew quite as well as Jimmy that nothing would induce her to leave the employ of the gloomy and most attractive young broker. Cliff had none of the facial beauty considered essential to romance—but Claire had fallen hard for him, much to her own dismay. Cliff seemed to consider her a walking doll equipped to take orders—just that and nothing more, while—well, she wanted to be wrapped in romance and love, but the crisp tones of her employer held nothing but annoyance at what he candidly termed her stupidity.

"How can I use my mind when I'm always thinking of how he'd look if he'd smile?" ran Claire's thoughts as she wildly put a letter from John Smith in the Y folder.

"The boss wants yer, Miss Claire," announced Jimmy; "he seems to be on the rampage, too."

Claire sighed and patted her hair.

"He says some one has been at his shelf," volunteered the boy.

Claire grew red. "Thank you, Jimmy, for warning me—I—"

"Can you tell me who touched this glass ball?"

"I—" Claire suppressed an absurd desire to mention the historic hatchet wielded by George and went on equably—"I dusted it."

"Good heavens. Dusted it. How like a woman. Didn't I tell you it was not to be touched? That ball is valuable—there are—" he checked himself and Claire narrowed her blue eyes in a way she'd observed on the silver sheet.

"Memories connected with it, I suppose," she interpolated. Then stared at him aghast.

The snow beat softly against the window, lending the office a white, unreal look as though they two were alone in a different world. The puzzled look in his deep gray eyes deepened as she grew peony red and then whitened. The pulse in her throat beat violently and she feared that he must hear the scudding leaps of her heart. What had possessed her to mention memories? He would surely guess what had prompted the word. Jealousy tore at her fiercely. Of course, she'd examined the glass ball—as soon as he had cautioned her about touching it she had been scarcely able to wait until he went out to luncheon. And she had seen a girl's face in the depths of the crystal—dark, mysterious eyes smiling inscrutably beneath a mop of red-gold curls, but it was the vivacious scarlet mouth that had held Claire's interest. The artist had caught the witchery of that painted smile and faithfully portrayed it.

Undoubtedly the miniature was that of the girl Cliff loved, and he couldn't bear to have alien fingers touch it. She lifted her head suddenly. Her employer was speaking.

"Just when did you handle this?"

"Several times. I dusted it early today."

He groaned. Claire raised affrighted eyes. Surely she could not have done much damage to that ridiculously beautiful face by taking off the city soot. Men in love were certainly foolish—when in love with the wrong woman.

"What possessed you to touch it? You didn't dust my desk."

Claire threw discretion to the four winds that seemed to be tossing her thoughts in various directions. "I'll be frank," she said. "You gave me many directions about that silly Bluebeard ball and I just made up my mind that I'd see what the secret was. She is very lovely and I hope you'll be happy."

He frowned. "Will you oblige me by not touching it again? Did Jack Carew stop in this morning to see my shelf of antiques?"

"Yes. He looked it over."

Cliff seemed unable to conceal his eagerness as he watched the pretty, willful face opposite him. Claire wasn't in the least beautiful, but there was a certain charm about her that caught the masculine interest.

"No. He simply stared—grinned a little as though at some secret thought and then turned on his heel. He left a message for you, too. 'Tell your employer that I'm not interested in any of his antiques, but that I'll drop in again if he gets anything new.'"

Cliff leaped toward the telephone and Claire heard him call up a criminal lawyer, repeating word for word what Claire had told him.

"Couldn't catch him with the old trick," ended Cliff. "Guess the reward is all off."

He turned to Claire. "I'm sorry I scolded you. After all, it didn't matter greatly—the dusting, I mean. Will you dine with me tonight to show you hear no grudge?"

Claire's heart fluttered in quite the approved manner. Perhaps this silent young man was human, after all. But, recalling the mystery of the scarlet mouth of the picture in the detested ball, she betrayed no eagerness, merely nodding with an indifference that cost her much.

Jack Carew came in after Cliff had gone out. Claire had been using her mind again and she scented more than a love affair, and, when the caller asked her to lift down Bluebeard's ball from its dim shelf for him to inspect she demurred prettily: "I've orders not to touch it."

"I'll take the blame. Just hold it toward the light, will you?"

She obeyed, but just as he started and stared intently at the picture she moved violently and dropped the crystal neatly into his ungloved hands.

He clutched the ball instinctively, then let it drop and started for the door.

"Jimmy, lock the office and telephone Mr. Dorrance that I've got the fingerprints he wants."

And Jack Carew, long trailed on a suspicion of a robbery, was caught by the ruse of putting his girl's picture in an antique ball.

"My part of the reward, Claire," said Cliff gayly that night as he faced her across a candle-lighted table, "will start us in housekeeping. How in the world did you ever guess my plan?"

Claire, dimpling with happiness, dropped her eyes before the look in his face. "At first," she confessed, "I thought the girl was some old—er—friend of yours, but I pieced together the telephone conversation you held with the lawyer and I knew you wanted Jack Carew to touch the glass ball. So I just arranged things so he'd have to touch it—that's all."

"Bluebeard's ball caught a notorious thief, but I—Claire—I've caught the one girl in the world."

Runner Goes Ahead of Street Cars in Japan

When the first electric cars began running in the streets of Kyoto, a man was specially commissioned to run ahead of the car, shouting to all passers-by a warning that a car was coming. We recall this incident with amused humor, and look at ourselves as greatly advanced than our fathers of those days.

But the popular saying that history repeats itself seems as much persistent as weeds that keep on popping up their heads everywhere. Kobe is a modern city in all that term implies. The city prides itself by calling it an international city. Along the best part of this city, there began running some time ago a smoky train toward the shore, a most prosaic sight that one would think of gracing the shore side of a modern city.

The train of necessity has to run through passing people, and in order to prevent it from severing the limbs of innocent people, a soot-covered fellow rides in front of the locomotive and shouts warning to the people as the train trails along the street. It is a sight worth one's last nickel to see a bulky affair, emitting smoke and dust, panting in hideous efforts to keep abreast with the sight of slick, tidy appearance of foreign-style buildings that line the street.

In these days when new car lines into a city are forced to run either underground or overhead, and the street car system now in force is being tolerated as a necessary nuisance, this "invasion" of a steam train system into the most congested part of a modern city will be effective in taking the city back half a century.

We really did not believe that history would repeat itself, but we revise our views and concede to some extent that history does a stunt once in a while that appears well-nigh repeating. It may repeat all it cares, provided the repeating will materially, if not morally, add to the beauty as well as substantial welfare of the locality.—Osaka Mainichi.

Tapping Rubber Trees

In the larger rubber tree plantations of Indo-China the practice of the so-called "alternate" tapping is more and more replacing the practice of daily tapping. The alternations may involve either long or short periods. If long, the tapping is done for one month out of three, or perhaps even four, depending upon the conditions of growth. If short periods are used the tapping is done one day out of two, three or four days. The tapping schedules are sometimes combined on the same plantation in such a way as to provide rest periods of at least six months in the course of two years.

Church Fostered Industry

In common with our old-established handicrafts, the glove trade is under greater indebtedness to the church than, possibly, many glovers would credit, writes D. A. Oswald, in the Glasgow Weekly Herald. Muscular Christianity is no new doctrine. In or about the year 790 Charlemagne granted an unlimited right to the abbot and monks of Sythia for making their gloves and girdles and covers for their books of the skin of the deer they killed, thus affording another proof of the use of gloves in those early times.

"Chagrined."

"And his wife?"

"She grinned."

Mosquito Bite Cures

After many years of disrepute as a carrier of contagion, the mosquito is beginning to emerge as a friend of man. J. F. It was found that the fever resulting from a mosquito bite lessened paralysis, and some complete cures were effected.

George Bernard Shaw, ever audacious, has plunged with characteristic heat into the discussion of women's clothes. He had a number of interesting things to say, one of which caused something of a sensation:

Saving Oil Tanks

The high mortality among the crude oil storage tanks of the country, so great that it is estimated that in some sections one out of five must be replaced annually, may be alleviated through a series of tests being conducted in Texas by the United States bureau of mines. The corrosion of the tanks is due to the high sulphur content of the crude oils, and to overcome this, the bureau experts are trying out aluminum as a substitute for the iron and steel, which are unable to stand the action of the hydrogen sulphides in the crude oil.

What the Gray House Hid

The Mystery of a Haunted Mansion

THE STORY

Hilton Hanby, prosperous New York merchant, has purchased a country place—the Gray house, near Pine Plains. Miss Selenos, a former tenant of the Gray house, calls at his office and warns him that the house is under a curse. Further alarming details are impressed upon Adolf Smucker, Hanby's secretary, by a man who claims to have been chauffeur for Sir Stanford Seymour, former occupant of the place. The Hanbys laugh off the warnings they have received both from Miss Selenos and from Smucker's acquaintance, as some form of practical joke.

"Who are you, to butt in like that?" she demanded finally.

Hanby came into the room, and she backed out.

"Forgot all about you, Smucker." Hanby admitted. "It was a birthday party. What is it?"

"I wish to see Mrs. Hanby, too," Smucker returned. "It's a matter of life and death."

Hanby saw that the fellow had been drinking, and that the unaccustomed stimulant had let down some of Smucker's barriers of restraint. He had always known that his employee disapproved of him, but he was unprepared for the hate that glared from the red-rimmed eyes. It came as something of a shock.

"Mrs. Hanby is busy," he said "Also I don't propose to inflict any business troubles on her. I may say that you behaved in very questionable taste in shouting what you did just now. It's none of your d—d business whether I have a few people in to dinner, is it?"

"A matter of life and death," Smucker went on. "I am wasting my time, alarming my own wife, and spending car fare, all for your benefit, and you insult me. I might have expected it!"

"It's nothing to do with office business, then?"

"A matter of life and death. Mrs. Hanby must hear it, too."

Hanby paused a moment.

"All right! I'll send for her."

Dina Hanby had long ago known that in Smucker her husband employed a disaffected and unpleasant sort of man. She bowed coldly to the intruder, who found in her fresh fuel for his wrath. He saw a lovely woman of forty, who looked no more than thirty. He hated her for that. Mrs. Smucker was not dowered with beauty. He saw a splendidly dressed woman who held herself regally. He considered that at forty a woman should be plump, and not concerned about dress or complexion. First of all she should be a good cook.

Mrs. Hanby outraged his sense of feminine proportion. She was slender and graceful. Once, in the office, when the light had been poor, he had mistaken her for Celia.

"I am the death's head at the feast," he said pompously. "You have been imagining yourself the mistress of a great mansion. It is a house of death and disaster!"

"Oh, Bill!" she cried. "What does he mean?"

What the red-faced man had told him an hour or so earlier, Smucker now wove into an intensely dramatic narrative. Mrs. Hanby, listening eagerly, learned that the house in which she and her children were to live had, since its erection more than a hundred years before, been the tomb of all young people who inhabited it. There was a superstitious strain in her, and Smucker could see that she grew uneasy. It irritated him to see Hanby immune from fear.

"Is this true?" she asked her husband.

It relieved her to see him wholly unaffected by the dread that gripped her. She did not understand why he was concerned mainly with getting an accurate description of Mr. Seymour's chauffeur.

"Smucker, it's kind of you to take the trouble to come here," said Hanby, at last; "but you've been the victim of a practical joker. I've had one already, and this is the second."

"You think I'm lying?" Smucker cried angrily.

"No—I think you were used merely as a tool."

"And this is your gratitude!" Bitterness was in Smucker's voice. "It is only what I might have expected!"

Smucker would have been wise to note the unusual look of sternness which passed across his employer's face.

"I will have a taxi called to take you to the subway. It is raining. I'm obliged to you for coming Smucker. You didn't know you were the victim of a man trying to play a joke on me."

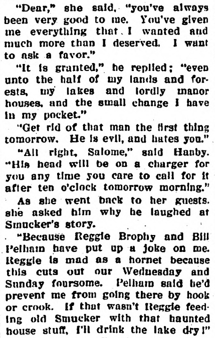
While Hanby went to the telephone in a booth outside, Smucker turned on Mrs. Hanby. He reveled in her uneasiness. It gave him, the bringer of it, a gratifying sense of superiority.

"Dance, drink, revel, and oppress while you may!" he said. "The time is coming when we intellectuals will reign!" He looked through the window, which showed the Hudson. "What do you see there?"

"The river, I suppose," said Mrs. Hanby, puzzled.

"It will be a river of blood some day, from Albany to the sea. It will be reddened with the blood of corrupt politicians, of the officer caste trained at West Point to enslave us. It will be red with the blood of New York capitalists. His blood, your husband's blood—"

Dina Hanby looked at him with flashing eyes. Why did this vindictive little creature hate a man who had kept him on year after year simply through pity?



"Be Quiet," She Said, "You Disgust Me!"

"Be quiet," she said, "you disgust me!"

She turned from him, and met her husband coming in.

"The taxi's coming," he said. "Let me know tomorrow to what expense you've been put. Good night!"

When Smucker had gone, Dina put her hands on her husband's shoulders.

"Dear," she said, "you've always been very good to me. You've given me everything that I wanted and much more than I deserved. I want to ask a favor."

"It is granted," he replied; "even unto the half of my lands and forests, my lakes and lordly manor houses, and the small change I have in my pocket."

"Get rid of that man the first thing tomorrow. He is evil, and hates you."

"All right, Salome," said Hanby. "His head will be on a charger for you any time you care to call for it after ten o'clock tomorrow morning."

As she went back to her guests, she asked him why he laughed at Smucker's story.

"Because Reggie Brophy and Bill Pelham have put up a joke on me. Reggie is mad as a hornet because this cuts out our Wednesday and Sunday foursome. Pelham said he'd prevent me from going there by hook or crook. If that wasn't Reggie feeding old Smucker with that haunted house stuff, I'll drink the lake dry!"

"It might be Reggie," she admitted. "It would be just like him What about Bill Pelham?"

"Bill is Selina, the patron saint of Pekes and toy Poms. Listen to the story of Miss Selenos, who hates and despises men, particularly me. Bill is about the best actor in our crowd, and he made up pretty well—well enough to fool me for a time."

"But would they do it?" she asked.

"It will be a long wet drink for me if—I'm wrong," he laughed.

"Wanted on the long distance, sir," said Mary Sloan.

"Ask Junior to go," said his father. "I want to tell the rest about Reggie and Bill," he explained to his wife.

Before he could commence his recital, Junior, usually impassive to the point of irritation, burst in.

"It's from the police at Pine Plains," he cried. "Dad, your caretaker at the Gray house has been murdered!"

* * * * * * *

Hilton Hanby came back to his guests after ten minutes at the telephone.

"A very unfortunate thing," he told them. "A man named Kerr, whom I engaged through my lawyers only yesterday, has been killed. I must go up tomorrow and see about it."

"I'll go with you, dad," Junior said promptly. "Tell us the details."

"There are none. Kerr was an unmarried man of good character, a veteran of the Spanish-American war, who had been living at Kingston. I wanted a caretaker, because we shan't be living there for a time, and I've been warned that thieves make a specialty of new plumbing fixtures, if there's nobody to guard them."

"But you haven't had time to put any in," said Dina.

"That's the mysterious part of it—there's nothing to steal. Kerr moved a bed and a few household belongings into a ground-floor room, and they have not been disturbed."

"Was he killed inside the house?" Celia demanded.

"No—outside. His body was found in the lake."

Hanby shot a quick look at his wife as he said this. From the little frown she gave he saw that the memory of what Smucker had said lingered with her and assumed a new importance at this tragedy.

"Was he drowned?" Dina asked.

"No—his head was battered in with the handle of a pick. Why they threw him in the lake I can't imagine."

"They did it to conceal the body," suggested Junior. "The weights probably slipped off and the corpse came to the surface again."

"Lakes are always dragged," Hanby replied. "It seems a silly, meaningless crime."

"There's always motivation, if you know where to look for it," Junior answered wisely. "On the whole, it's rather fortunate that I'm going up with you tomorrow."

"The police will be delighted," his father said.

Hanby was annoyed to think that this crime had obtruded itself on his birthday. It was a bad beginning for his ownership of the Gray house.

"'The police!" sneered Junior. "What do the police know of the psychology of crime?"

"Pity them, don't chide them," Celia mocked. "Poor policemen, they haven't been to Mercersburg and New Haven."

"There's probably a whole lot more in this than you think," Junior went on, unshaken. "On the face of it, it's a crazy, motiveless crime. We may run into all sorts of amazing things—wheels within wheels. Kerr may not have been a caretaker. He may have been sent there to spy on us."

"Then who killed him?" Hanby snapped. He could see that Dina was disturbed more than he liked. "And why?"

"That we shall find out," replied Junior. "When first you spoke of the Gray house, I thought there was something mysterious about it. Why did it stand empty so long? Haunted, probably. Oh, these things happen! In your generation they scoffed, but we are wiser. In my psychology class—"

"Tell me about it tomorrow," interrupted his father. "Come on, people—let's dance! This is my birthday. Away with gloom!"

He seized Dina, and they began elaborate improvisations on a fox-trot motif.

"You don't think there's anything in it, do you?" Dina asked him. "I mean, anything to do with what that awful little man was saying?"

"Of course not," he answered. "We shall find at the inquest that some roving tramp killed Kerr to steal his savings."

"Tramps!" she said. She was city bred, and distrusted remote places. "There are always tramps, aren't there?"

"They won't worry us. We shall have a house filled with people, and there'll be gardeners and workers Also—this is my great surprise—I'm taking a year off from business. I can afford it."

Why Father Incurred Small Girl's Censure

The late Marcus Loew, the movie millionaire, praised marriage at a movie banquet.

"Marriage," he said, "is a fine thing, especially for women. It gives a woman freedom. We like to see married women flirt. It is an attractive sight. But if a married man flirts!

"You all know, of course, the old story of the married man whose wife said to him:

"'John, I didn't like the way you stared at that blonde girl at lunch.'

"And John said glumly, 'Well, neither did she.'

"Here's another story.

"A little girl of seven was taken by her father and mother to a department store to be fitted out for school. While the mother chose sweaters and shoes and so on in the children's section, wandering here and there, the father got into a pleasant chat with a pretty girl at the lingerie counter.

"His little daughter watched him for some time with disapproving looks; then she shouted across the store to her mother:

"'Mother, just look at father! You'd never think he was married to us, would you?'"

Examples of Higher Criticism

WHENEVER actors get together it is almost inevitable that sooner or later the subject of dramatic criticism will come up and that someone present will quote a notice favorable or unfavorable—but generally favorable—touching on his own work.

No symposium of this sort is complete without reference to the instance of tact displayed in print by a local reporter on a certain historic occasion in a small middle-western city when ambitious nonprofessionals gave a classic drama. The newspaper man who had been detailed to cover the performance was wishful to avoid giving offense to the members of the cast yet, in honesty, he could say nothing complimentary. So he merely wrote this:

"For the benefit of the new hospital fund, our leading amateurs presented 'Lady Audley's Secret' at the theater last night before a large audience of our best townspeople. The orchestra rendered several pleasing selections and the acoustics of the hall were never better."

Then there is the famous criticism done by an editor in Rising Sun, Ind., when a certain native-born prodigy essayed the role of the melancholy Dane. The criticism ran something like this:

"Among scholars there has long been a dispute as to whether the works attributed to Shakespeare were written by Shakespeare or by Bacon. The editor of this paper has hit upon a satisfactory way of settling for all time this ancient question. Let the tombs of both be opened. The one who turned over in his grave last night was the author of Hamlet!"

I am reminded also of what Kin Hubbard, better known as "Abe Martin," had to say years ago of a certain theatrical entertainment. For brevity and yet for completeness I think it would be hard to beat this:

"Al Jeffrey's Uncle Tom's Cabin company played at the opera house last night. The Siberian bloodhound was badly supported."

Hap Ward, the comedian, furnishes one from his own experience:

"We were playing a one-night stand in Oregon," said Hap. "On the morning following the performance I found a notice of our show on the front page of the town paper. The opening sentence was promising—I smiled to myself as I saw it. For it read as follows:

"'Ward and Vokes in their new play, as given here last night, were not half bad.'

"Then I read the second sentence and quit smiling.

"'On the contrary, they were all bad!'"

A Message From the Other Shore

IT WAS at a spiritualistic seance. The medium specialized in summoning the spirits of great personages back from the Other Shore, and the result was a varied entertainment, highly satisfactory to the assembled true believers. Thomas Jefferson played rather badly on a bugle, and Mary Queen of Scots rapped on a table and made a chair waltz on two legs, and Mark Anthony strummed a guitar, and Sir Isaac Newton addressed the reverent gathering briefly, speaking with a pronounced South Brooklyn accent.

At this juncture the medium's husband made a special announcement: If any person present wished to communicate with the shade of some illustrious one who had not already taken part in the evening's program, Madame would endeavor to materialize the individual desired.

An English woman who was a devout churchwoman spoke up. She would like to behold and speak with Cardinal Newman, or at least, she hoped to have a message from him, personally delivered.

Madame agreed to try. She went off into a trance, uttering muffled, moaning sounds. Presently the black draperies of the cabinet were agitated and then, in the pale, bluish light which focused upon the cabinet and left the rest of the room in darkness, appeared a dim figure swathed in white.

In the midst of a hushed silence this shape took one step forward, raised two fingers of the right hand in the gesture of the apostolic blessing and in impressively deep tones uttered the following:

"Benedictine!"

Breathe Deeply

A good circulation of air means a good circulation of blood. It means better nerves, better energies and better health, so when you resolve to take at least ten deep breaths every day, filling your lungs to the very bottom, you are forming a resolution that is going to mean a great deal to your health.

Realistic Travel

A steamship advertisment promises that "as you go up the gangplank in New York you get the tangy smell of salt and tar in your nostrils." Probably the company keeps a barrel of each standing beside the gangplang. And for $10 extra they will supply a pirate with cutlass in teeth.—Woman's Home Companion.

Acidity

The common cause of digestive difficulties is excess acid. Soda cannot alter this condition, and it burns the stomach. Something that will neutralize the acidity is the sensible thing to take. That is why physicians tell the public to use Phillips Milk of Magnesia.

One spoonful of this delightful preparation can neutralize many times its volume in acid. It acts instantly; relief is quick, and very apparent. All gas is dispelled; all sourness is soon gone; the whole system is sweetened. Do try this perfect anti-acid, and remember it is just as good for children, too, and pleasant for them to take.

Any drug store has the genuine, prescriptional product.

Will Hail Braille as Benefactor of Blind

Every blind person has reason to be thankful that, 117 years ago, a little boy of three became blind. For this year, says an article in London Answers, is the centenary of the invention, by this same boy, of the Braille system, which enables the blind to read and write.

Lewis Braille was only twenty when he invented his famous system by which combinations of six dots form letters, numerals, punctuation marks, and musical signs. It is now in general use among the blind, and books on Braille can be obtained on all sorts of subjects.

But that does not exhaust the marvels of Braille. A blind shorthand writer, using the Braille system of shorthand, can "take down" at 180 words a minute. And the most complicated mathematical problems can be worked out by means of the Braille numerals.

Yet it was not until 40 years after its invention that Braille was generally adopted among the blind in this country. Now, however, its value is fully recognized, and the National Institute for the Blind is planning to celebrate the centenary of Lewis Braille's great system.

Modern Youth

Yes, it happened in 1929. A newsboy on Market street, between Fourth and Fifth streets, chased a man half a block to restore a banknote the man had accidently jerked out of his pocket. And then the boy was reluctant to take half the amount of the banknote as a reward. We read so much about crooks and embezzlers and sharpers that sometimes we wonder how the vast business of the country ever gets carried on. That kind of boy is the answer.—San Francisco Chronicle.

IT'S DANGEROUS GROUND you stand on—with a cough, a cold or grippe, and your blood impoverished. You must do something! Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery enriches the blood—builds health and strength.

As a general tonic it is far superior to anything I have ever tried. I find 'Golden Medical Discovery' is a wonderful medicine for the stomach, and also to produce rich red blood and to give strength and tone up one's entire system."

Club members from every county in Northwestern Minnesota are expected to attend the eighteenth annual Boys' and Girls' Short Course to be held at the Northwest School of Agriculture, Crookston, June 10-13, inclusive. Members of the Northwest School faculty, together with several outside speakers and demonstrators will be in charge of a well planned program of lectures and demonstrations, including work with livestock, crops, cooking, sewing, and canning. According to H. A. Pflughoeft, district club leader, the educational features will be interspersed with a variety of contests, stunts, movies and outdoor games. This short course offers an unusual opportunity for boy and girl club members to secure information that will help them in thier work during the summer. Large delegations from several clubs in adjoining counties have already signified thier intention of coming.

A leaders' class, under the direction of H.A. Pflughoeft will be conducted each day for older club members and local leaders. Special work is also being arranged for boys and girls who have attended previous short courses. As in former years, livestock judging work and practical demonstrations will be given an important place on the program. All boys and girls will room on the campus in the school dormitories and be given the same supervision as students attending the regular six months courses. The total cost of board, room, and entertainment will be $3.00. Write the Northwest School, Crookston, for reservations.

Registration Still Gaining

According to the announcement of Mike Holm, Secretary of State, issued to the press on Wednesday, May 1st, motor vehicle registration in Minnesota is still on the increase.

The number of autos registered up to May 1, 1923 from January 1st, was 597,074, while in the same period 1929 the total registered was 639,970 making a gain of 42,896.

The amount collected up to May 1, 1928 was $8,951,709.21 while during the same period of 1929 the total amount collected from the first of the year was $9,558,810.63, with a total gain of the sum of $607,101.42.

J. E. Erickson of Thief River Falls, who has been a subscriber to the News since it was started over eighteen years ago, has just sent us his money order for renewal and, wishes us a lot of prosperity the coming year.

Thanks Mr. Frickson. It is subscribers like you that makes our work pleasant and help keep the paper going.

Steinhauer Takes Lead

The local creamery is going big this year, and this can be proved when you read the Honer Roll for March. Arno Steinhauer made the largest delivery of cream in March that has been made by any one patron in one month since the creamery started here.

The rest of the boys are doing fine and it looks as if they all intend to whoop-er-up during the summer.

Short Lessons in Dairying

LESSON 61

PRODUCTION: White clover and Kentucky blue grass are best for permanent pasture—land too hilly, or stony, or low to be plowed. White clover and blue grass are permanent. They may be seeded on the pasture sod and should be seeded very early in the spring—just as the frost starts out. The ground should be disked or harrowed if possible. A light dressing of manure will help give them a start. Two pounds of white clover and three pounds of blue grass will give a good start.

MANUFACTURING: The tremendous increase in the consumption of milk in the past ten years has been largely due to great improvement in the quality of milk. Milk now tastes good. It comes in a tightly capped bottle so the air cannot even touch it.

MARKETING: The recent Chicago milk strike brought out the fact that the men who delivered the milk from house to house got practically as much from the milk companies as the farmers did for producing it. This illustrates one point well and that is that the milk wagon drivers are well organized to deliver milk and that the farmers were very poorly organized up to that time to market milk. The farmers won the strike by getting together--by organizing.

America's Westminster Abbey

THE dream of The Father of His Country of a national church "for all people" in the National Capital is about to be realized. On Mount Saint Albans, 400 feet above the old city of Washington, on a 67-acre plot in the District of Columbia, this colossal national church—the Washington cathedral—is being slowly and magnificently fashioned into an everlasting reality, under a congressional charter to the Protestant Episcopal cathedral foundation of the District of Columbia, "For the promotion of religious education and charity."

Not since the Fourteenth century, it is said, has a cathedral like this been built. Probably not in this nor the next generation will another such Gothic structure be raised.

Into the foundation alone went 9,000,000 pounds of cement, 10,000 tons of sand and 18,000 tons of gravel. Its monstrous dimensions fairly stagger one—length 534 feet, width at transcepts 215 feet, inside height 95 feet, height of central tower 265 feet—the architectural idea being to produce the most distinctively additional cathedral the world ever has seen. Its seating capacity will be 5,000 with standing room for 27,000 additional persons. Ground was broken for Bethlehem chapel in 1908. No date for opening the completed structure has been set. The estimated cost is $10,760,000.

The crypt is destined to become a hallowed shrine in which will be preserved the memorials of those who served both their God and their country with unusual fidelity. There will be space for 1,000 bodies. Here now rest Woodrow Wilson, our war President; Admiral Dewey, the hero of Manila bay, Right Reverend Satterlee, the first bishop of Washington, and a few others.

Taxing Of Trailers Now Made Definite

Two-wheeled trailers of less than 1,000 pounds capacity used only with pleasure vehicles and not used to carry goods or passengers for hire, are exempted from the license tax, under an amendment to the motor vehicle law passed by the recent legislature.

The old law provided that trailers of less than 1,000 pounds capacity used "occasionally" with pleasure cars, were exempt. The attorney general held that those used "regularly", even if they were not used frequently, should be licensed. But it was difficult to know where to draw the line, and very few were actually registered. The amendment removes the uncertainty.

All trailers used with trucks must be registered. The rate of tax will be 2.4 per cent, 3.4 per cent or 10 per cent, depending upon whether the trailer is used with a "T" truck, and "X" truck or a "Y" truck

Talks Without Tongue

John L. Nichols, a winter visitor at Los Angeles, has not had a tongue for sixteen years, but he proved to be one of the most fluent speakers heard by the Toastmasters' club there. Surgical removal of his tongue was necessary in 1912 and eight weeks later he began gradually to develop the power of speech. There are only fourteen of the twenty-six letters in the alphabet that can be pronounced without the aid of the tongue, Nichols says. The other twelve he sounds by blowing or whistling. Once he talked to 300 men at a convention for two hours and a stenographer taking down the speech misunderstood only one word.

One who will walk out of his way to avoid temptation doesn't care very much for sin, anyhow.

What Will you do

When your Children Cry for It

There is hardly a household that hasn't heard of Castoria! At least five million homes are never without it. If there are children in your family, there's almost daily need of its comfort. And any night may find you very thankful there's a bottle in the house. Just a few drops, and that colic or constipation is relieved; or diarrhea checked. A vegetable product; a baby remedy meant for young folks. Castoria is about the only thing you have ever heard doctors advise giving to infants. Stronger medicines are dangerous to a tiny baby, however harmless they may be to grown-ups. Good old Castoria! Remember the name, and remember to buy it. It may spare you a sleepless, anxious night. It is always ready, always safe to use; in emergencies, or for everyday ailments. Any hour of the day or night that Baby becomes fretful, or restless. Castoria was never more popular with mothers than it is today. Every druggist has it.

"GHOSTLY" CHORDS STARTLE FAMILY

Mysterious Notes Come From Piano at Night.

Nottingham, England.—Eerie chords struck from an unattended piano in the dead of night have nearly succeeded in convincing the skeptical Eason family of Cottesmore road, Nottingham, that there are such things as ghosts.

Recently after Mrs. Arthur Eason, who is seventy-six years old, and her three daughters had retired for the night they were startled to hear chords struck on the piano downstairs, and simultaneously heard sounds as if furniture was being moved about.

"We had been in bed about half an hour when we heard a chord struck on the piano, immediately followed by the whining and scratching of Tony, our little fox terrier, who sleeps in the front room.

"Then to our alarm two more chords were struck.

"I was too scared to move, but one of my sisters went down to investigate. The room was empty, but the dog was trembling visibly."

According to Mrs. Eason the notes heard were similar to those which used to be played by her blind brother, who died two years ago, and who was for many years organist at the local Wesleyan church.

"I'm not psychic, and I don't believe in ghosts," said Mrs. Eason. "I was certain that the sounds had been caused by some practical joker, and the next day I set out to find who had broken into our house and played the piano. I was confronted first with the fact that all the windows and the doors were locked tight. Searching inquiry among neighbors failed to shed any light on the occurance.

"Subsequently we have heard sounds at night as though of furniture being moved about downstairs, and once a blind suddenly flew up with no one near it.

"No. I still don't believe in ghosts, but all the same I am beginning to wonder."

First False Teeth Worn by Woman of 300 B. C.

Santa Monica, Calif.—The first false teeth, so far as we know today, were worn by a woman of Sidon in Phoenicia about 300 B. C., according to Dr. Roy L. Moodie, well-known anatomist.

The Phoenician woman's jaw, with the false teeth, is preserved in the Louvre, in Paris. The two right incisors are represented by artificial teeth, held in place and bound to each other by gold wire. The wire has been drawn through careful perforations in the artificial teeth.

Although the Egyptians pioneered in treatment of many diseased conditions of the body, this sort of dental replacement apparently was never devised by Egyptian physicians. Thousands of mummies, representing 7,000 years of life in Egypt, have been examined but no clear evidence of such repair work has ever been found. It appears that we not only owe our alphabet and numerous geographic discoveries to the restless, inquiring minds of the Phoenicians, Doctor Moodie points out, but also we are indebted to them for this entrance into prosthetics, which is a particularly valuable field of dentistry.

Sidewalk Artist Copies Work of "Old Masters"

London.—Persons coming out of Burlington House, Piccadilly, where the $15,000,000 exhibition of Dutch paintings is in progress, have been amazed to see beautiful copies of some of the principal exhibits painted in the street pavement nearby.

The street artist, who refused to reveal his name, has surprised experts by his ability, and it has been learned that he at one time exhibited in the Paris solon and showed signs of becoming an eminently successful artist.

Tiny Golf Bag Manicure Sets Latest Paris Fad

Paris.—Tiny golf bags for manicure sets are among the latest novelties for Parisian women, who pride themselves on the charm of their dainty fingers. The imitation golf sticks which perk their small metal heads from the little sack, when pulled out, prove to be file, orange stick, clipper, miniature scissors and other similar accessories.

Radio Waves Mix Texts of 3 Speakers

"The Old Testament tells us that baby chicks should detour one mile south of Salina and listen to the word of the prophets. After passing through Leavenworth, turn north to Jericho. A bond issue is being talked of in the Holy City."

The radio fan discovered that one radiocaster was a minister, one a man giving condition of the roads, and the other a lecturer on poultry.

MEXICO IS DUE FOR NEW FORTUNE HUNTS

Every Revolution Has Own Special Stories.

Eagle Pass, Texas.—It will soon be time for new stories of buried money and treasure of fabulous value to come out of Mexico. Following each of the previous revolutions tall tales of this kind have been told and many are the expeditions that have gone forth in futile search for the hidden wealth. It has long been the practice of rebel leaders to take advantage of war-time conditions and confiscate bank funds wherever they could be found. The present revolution is no exception to this old established custom. From the banks of Monterey, Saltillo, Durango and Toreon, money which was said to belong to the federal and state governments, aggregating approximately $1,500,000, has been taken by the different rebel army leaders.

In each instance the army officers gave their personal memorandum that the funds had been taken and would be repaid when the new regime got into power. It is from money obtained in this manner that the soldiers of the rebel armies are daily paid. It was stated by arrivals here from Torreon that during the time the revolutionists occupied that city the privates were lined up each morning while the paymaster handed to each man one and one-half pesos, equivalent to 75 cents American money.

Carry Cash Along.

The cash is carried along with the fighting contingents in big motor trucks. If by any chance the rebels are defeated, the custodian or the funds make a wild drive for some remote spot where the wealth is buried to await a propitious time for its recovery.

One of the most striking stories of buried treasure in Mexico relates to the fortune which Francisco Villa is asserted to have concealed in some remote spot in the Sierra Madres. Villa made a number of large hauls from banks, stores and private individuals from time to time. In the city of Chihuahua he found $500,000 of gold coins concealed in one of the hollow pillars in the vestibule of the Banco de Mineral and he carried the money off into the mountains. During the brief time that he and Emiliano Zapata, the Morelos bandit, were in joint control of Mexico City, they were said to have depleted the national treasury of more than $2,000,000. The treasuries of several states were also looted by Villa.

Acquired Big Roll.

At the time he was assassinated it was estimated by several of his intimate associates that he had accumulated a fortune of more than $6,000,000 during his banditry and rebel activities. This wealth, according to current belief, was buried in the mountains about two days' mule-back ride to the west of Parral, state of Chihuahua. The hidden hoard, it was said, was drawn upon secretly by Villa on several occasions after he settled down upon the big ranch in the state of Durango which the federal government had given him as a peace offering. Following Villa's death, an expedition was outfitted at Parral and spent several weeks searching for the fortune, but it was never located. From time to time since then other searches have been made for the treasure, but all of them failed.

Manly rebel leaders and bandit chiefs of lesser notoriety are credited with having buried their loot in various places, from one end of the country to the other, and these stories have been the cause of many treasure hunts.

Boy Babies Shown to Be Weaker Than Sisters

Washington.—Despite the general belief that the male constitution is inherently stronger than the female, girl babies have a 30 per cent better chance of living than have boys, the Labor department's children's bureau has found.

More boys than girls are born each year in the United States registration area, but for every 100 female infant deaths there are 130 male mortalities among children under one year old, it was found.

The boy's greater need of sunlight accounts for this difference in death rates, it was said. Males, deprived of the sun's beneficial rays, soon develop such diseases as rickets and tetanis. Girls are said to have a higher resistance to these maladies.

Artificial sunlight, it is believed by the bureau, "is strongly indicated as a method of reducing the present mortality sex ratio."

Stonehenge Will Be Preserved by British

London.—Stonehenge, ancient monument of man's worship during the late Stone age, is to be preserved for future generations.

The huge stone monuments, set in the shape of a horseshoe on Salisbury Plains, had been threatened by a bungalow-building operation. Altogether 1,444 acres have been purchased around the lonely plateau at a cost of about $155,000, subscribed by the general public.

At present there is a barbed-wire fence around the site and an admission fee is charged visitors. It is expected the fence will be removed and the site opened to the public free.

GAMBLERS PREY ON SEA TOURISTS

Atlantic Liners Are Plagued by Card Sharpers.

London.—With more American tourists visiting Europe than ever before, the Atlantic liners are being plagued more and more by the professional gambler.

Acting in conjunction with the British and American police, and with the steamship officials afloat, the French authorities have contrived to make at least one haul, and some prominent gamblers now find themselves debarred from obtaining a ticket from any of the big steamship companies.

This card sharper trouble is one of the greatest of all that beset the paths of the steamship companies. They do all that they possibly can to check it, but there is a difficulty at every turn.

It is no offense to play cards on board ship, and it is no offense to play poker just a little better than one's opponents, so that the ship's officers have to be very certain that there is actual cheating going on before they can take any legal action.

Every passenger is warned against playing cards for money with chance acquaintances, or indulging in high stakes with anybody. Yet there are many who will not be advised and who resent any interference with their liberty, particularly any suggestion that they are not well able to look after themselves.

Gentlemen of the "profession" are generally well primed with good stories and have all the knowledge of the world which delights the tyro at traveling.

So the lines are always working at a disadvantage in their efforts to protect those who will not take advice, and occasionally it is necessary to resort to unorthodox means to circumvent the gamblers.

There is one story concerning a famous western ocean officer who was a remarkably clever conjurer. He saw perfectly well how two rich young passengers were being plucked, but had not the legal proof necessary to take official action. So he took a hand in the game, and won back for the two youngsters every penny that they had lost with a little over for seamen's charities.

Lindbergh Has Sister Living in Minnesota

St. Paul, Minn.—Now, at last, the secret's out. Col. Charles Lindbergh has a sister!

There's not a person living in Red Lake Falls, a town of 2,000 citizens, who doesn't know the comely little wife of the editor of the Red Lake Falls is a sister of the illustrious colonel.

But outside of the town few have ever heard of Mrs. Eva Lindbergh Christie. Few even suspected Colonel Lindbergh had a sister. The reason for the secret is that Mrs. Christie is extremely modest and fears publicity.

"You see, it's this way," she explains. "My mother was Mary Lafond. She died when I was only five years old, and father married again. Charlie was born of that second marriage. Charlie and I were children together in Little Falls, Minn., but we became separated when I went to college. Then I became a schoolteacher and was married to Mr. Christie.

"Charlie and I were together about five years ago when father died, and then we separated, and until he came to Minneapolis after his Paris flight I didn't see him. But we did have a nice reunion in Minneapolis. I'm glad Charlie's doing so well and I hope when he gets married he will bring his bride here to visit us."

Lost Diamond Ring Is Found in Pretzel

Sandusky, Ohio.—Edward Sprau, local grocer, has good reason to believe he was born under a lucky star. For years Sprau wore a valuable diamond ring. One day he noticed it was gone from his finger. All efforts to recover the ring were futile.

Sprau's son, Edwin, called on his girl friend one night. The young lady's mother passed a bag of pretzels around the guests. One of the girls present put her hand in the bag for a pretzel but withdrew a diamond ring instead. It belonged to the elder Sprau.

Wedding in Doubt, but O. K.'d by Legislature

New Britain, Conn.—Mr. and Mrs. Staunton E. Ashley are on their honeymoon, safely married—through an act of the state legislature. After Ashley and his bride, the former Miss Elva McKirdy, left on their honeymoon their parents discovered the Shuttle Meadow Country club, where the marriage took place, was over Bristol boundary line. The license, obtained in New Britain, would not have been recognized in Bristol. They immediately appealed to the legislature, which passed a special act validating the marriage.

HOW TO LIVE LONGER

By JOHN CLARENCE FUNK

DEADLY ROMANCE

ONE afternoon recently a man drove his family into the country. It was a beautiful day, spring was at its best, and the trip was a joyful success. Around noontime the picnic lunch was spread near an old stone walled spring. Here on the back road the romance of days gone by when father had been a boy on the farm, returned to life. And the water so sparkling, and so clear!

Now for the other side of the picture. Two weeks later the parents and the two children became sick. Three weeks later all of them had gone through serious illness, the youngest child unsuccessfully. The romance had been attractive but the unseen typhoid germs had got in their work. Things at the spring had not been what they seemed to be.

City dwellers take pure, clear and safe water as a matter of course. Aren't they paying taxes and water bills for just that thing? Very well, and very logical. But many urbanites forget that at the city line the filtration plant and its intelligent overseers cease to function. It therefore does not pay to become too enthusiastic over the old oaken bucket, the spring by the wayside and the antique pump.

Quite true, some states, but by no means all of them, annually check up on the highway water supplies on the main traveled roads for the protection of the motoring public. They even placard as "Safe" or "Unsafe" every individual source of supply that is likely to serve the passing automobilist. But even in these careful jurisdictions the by-roads in all probability will be missed. Better go thirsty, therefore, if the romantic water supplies cannot present clear proof of their safety.

In this connection, a word to country dwellers. Have your individual supply checked annually by a recognized laboratory. A small money outlay will be necessary but it's nothing compared to doctor bills or funeral expenses. In addition, obtain and study the literature published by your state department of health on this most important subject. Don't take any chances on your water supply no matter how good it looks or tastes.

Acting upon this advice may save illness and even death.

QUACK, QUACK

THE barefaced assumption of scientific superiority displayed by quacks should be enough to settle anyone. Add to this the studio portraits of the wizards themselves, and the last vestige of appeal should be gone. But, somehow, the thing works just the other way.

The ability to toot their own horns is their only merit. Having failed in the ethical practice of their professions—medical or dental, if, indeed, they possess even these qualifications—these egotistical gentry purchase space in newspapers (when they can) and in this manner brazenly admit to the world that they have beaten it, including all the scientists and leaders of their chosen calling. Thus they are able to effect marvelous and hitherto unknown cures for as low as a dollar down! Which, it must be confessed, is low indeed.

And so it comes to pass that hundreds of thousands of dollars annually are expended by people who still believe in fairy stories. If this was all there was to it, possibly no objection would be made. If a fellow wants to throw his money away, that's his business. But when it comes to throwing health away, then the matter assumes public importance and a warning is quite justifiable.

In all fairness, quacks sometimes cure people. But their main interest usually is in the money they can extract—not in the amount of health they can bestow. As a matter of fact, many instances are on record where a physical condition has been aggravated for the sole purpose of prolonging the cure.

Indeed, sometimes the outlook as stated by this particular brand of medico has been so unpleasantly (and untruthfully) tragic that the patient upon hearing the verdict has straightway left the office and committed suicide!

The legitimate medical profession, on the other hand, is the foundation of the nation's health. Each community has its share of honest, well-informed and experienced practitioners. What more do you need? Can you afford less?

If you are looking, therefore, for "value received" and health, don't make friends with the quacks.

OLD FOLKS SAY DR. CALDWELL WAS RIGHT

The basis of treating sickness has not changed since Dr. Caldwell left Medical College in 1875, nor since he placed on the market the laxative prescription he had used in his practice.

He treated constipation, biliousness, headaches, mental depression, indigestion, sour stomach and other indispositions entirely by means of simple vegetable laxatives, herbs and roots. These are still the basis of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, a combination of senna and other mild herbs, with pepsin.

The simpler the remedy for constipation, the safer for the child and for you. And as you can get results in a mild and safe way by using Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, why take chances with strong drugs?

A bottle will last several months, and all can use it. It is pleasant to the taste, gentle in action, and free from narcotics. Elderly people find it ideal. All drug stores have the generous bottles, or write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. BB, Monticello, Illinois, for free trial bottle.

San Xavier Del Bac

SAN XAVIER DEL BAC is a great white church near Tucson, Ariz., which reaches well back toward the beginning of history in America.

Somewhat contrary to the general rule, this venerable edifice, said to be the most complete Spanish mission in the world today, faces due south—presumably because of the fact that such supply trains and visitors that might come were likely to approach from the south—Mexico.

Dates connected with its history are confused. It appears to have been established along about 1692, by the aged Father Kino, who set out northwest from the City of Mexico to spread the light of Christianity among the tribes of the North.

Approached from the south, the symmetry and beauty of the mission is decidedly impressive. There are two great towers with flying buttresses on either side of a highly ornate entrance, above which rests a noble dome. One of the towers is incomplete. The reason why probably never will be known. Immediately in front of the church is a walled enclosure which became a burying ground. The Indian believed that the nearer to the church his remains rested the better were his chances of reaching Paradise.

The thick walls of masonry stop the heat without impeding the flow of light, since the sun's rays strike the recess and enter the church by reflection. Inside the air is laden with ages of incense, but walls disclose a decorative effect which appears a bit bazarre, with frescoes of genuine merit—all symbolic, apparently, of San Xavier, in which the shell plays an outstanding part.

Village Election In Dec.

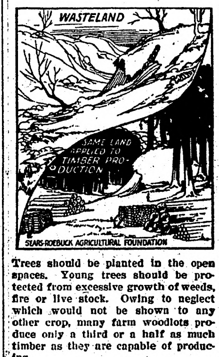
The last legislature changed the time of holding elections in all villages and townships from March to December, with the new set of officers taking over their duties the first of the year.

Getting More Income From Farm Timber

Farm income from timber can be greatly increased by better handling of the present farm woodlots and by planting additional land that is better suited for trees than for other crops, says the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. The United States is using timber three to five times as fast as its forests are growing it, and lumber prices are gradually rising as a result.

Thousands of acres of small, irregular fields, thin or rocky lands, swamps, and hillsides inclined to wash, should be planted to species of trees adapted to the soil, slope and climate and which have high value for farm or commercial use.

In managing the farm woodlot, trees which are mature, overcrowded, defective or of inferior species should be removed from time to time and sound, straight, young trees given the room.



WASTELAND
SAME LAND APPLIED TO TIMBER PRODUCTION
SEARS-ROEBUCK AGRICULTURAL FOUNDATION

Trees should be planted in the open spaces. Young trees should be protected from excessive growth of weeds, fire or live stock. Owing to neglect which would not be shown to any other crop, many farm woodlots produce only a third or a half as much timber as they are capable of producing.

An acre fully stocked with trees will grow 250 to 1,000 board feet of timber a year, the Foundation states. Pines grow faster than hardwoods and annual production is greater in latitudes with a long growing season. Posts and railroad ties can be produced in 1 to 30 years, depending on the species, the soil and the climate, and saw timber can be produced in 20 to 40 years.

Besides farm uses, the products of the woodlot can be sold for sawlogs, fence posts, piling, pulpwood, firewood, cooperage bolts, handle bolts and railroad ties. In some sections, nut trees in farm forest plantings furnish another profitable market product. By acting as a windbreak, a farm woodlot will add to the value of the farm.

"Bring me the winner!"

THE story is told of a man dining in a restaurant, who was served a lobster with only one claw. Upon complaining he was told by the waiter that this happened occasionally because the live lobsters fought among themselves in the kitchen. "Bring me the winner!" said the diner.

At the General Motors Proving Ground, a fleet of specimen cars, built long in advance of factory production, fight a battle of hills, bumps, and every other sort of torture. These cars are torn down and rebuilt until they are able to beat every test. The tests involve speed, power, endurance, braking, riding comfort, handling ease; fuel, oil, and tire economy; body strength—every phase of car construction and performance.

Only the winner of all these tests is sent back to the factory to be used as a model for the construction of the car you buy. No matter what driving condition you face, your General Motors car is equal to it. You have the winner.

What the Gray House Hid

The Mystery of a Haunted Mansion

THE STORY

Hilton Hanby, prosperous New York merchant, has purchased a country place—the Gray house, near Pine Plains. Miss Selenos, a former tenant of the Gray house, calls at his office and warns him that the house is under a curse. Further alarming details are impressed upon Adolf Smucker, Hanby's secretary, by a man who claims to have been chauffeur for Sir Stanford Seymour, former occupant of the place. The Hanbys laugh off the warnings they have received both from Miss Selenos and from Smucker's acquaintance, as some form of practical joke. But they are shocked when they hear that the caretaker whom they have put in charge of the Gray house, a man named Kerr, has been mysteriously murdered.

"Oh, Hil, how lovely!" she cried. "I've hated your business because it has kept you away from us so much. Can you really afford it?"

"I'm rolling in money," he said gayly. "I bought acreage and sold by the front foot. I'm a boy again!"

"That's nothing new, Housatonic," she laughed. "Ada Bishop really believes that's your absurd name. You'll be a boy when you die!"

"Darling Dina, don't worry about Smucker and his drunken dream. I'll have it out with old Bill tomorrow, and Reggie will have to confess that he failed. It was a fool scheme of theirs, anyway."

"When did you ever know Bill Pelham to do anything really foolish?"

"He acted the part superbly. It fooled me completely."

"I don't mean that exactly. It seems so stupid to imagine that any one could be scared away from a house by vague talk like that. Hil, do verify the names Smucker gave you—Mr. Seymour and the others. Promise me!"

"Probably all names that Reggie thought up on the spur of the moment; but I'll ask the agent I bought the place from, if that will satisfy you."

* * * * * * *

Adolf Smucker was always earlier at the office than the other employees. It gained him a reputation for punctuality, and enabled him to learn much of the firm's business that would otherwise be kept from him.

He was nervous on this particular morning. He had gone home the night before, and had told his family of all the daring and splendid things he had said and done. Mrs. Smucker, usually so admiring and reassuring, had remarked:

"Dolf, you've fired yourself. You might have waited till the two girls was out of school!"

Smucker's father had listened rapturously to the account of the planked steak.

"Real beer!" he said many times. "Not in this life shall I taste real beer again!"

"Nor in the life to come," said his daughter-in-law. "Turn your thought from your sinful appetites." She looked at the clock. "It's time you went to the docks."

Assuredly Adolf Smucker was unhappy. He was filing letters industriously when Hanby sent for him.

"No," said Hanby, as Adolf unsheathed his newly pointed pencils, "I'm not giving you any letters today. I'm getting rid of you. The cashier will pay you a month's salary."

The Adam's apple tried to burst its bounds.

"I'm sure I've worked long and faithfully for you, Mr. Hanby," Smucker cried. "I don't deserve this!"

"You don't," returned Hanby. "Two weeks' salary would be quite sufficient. Listen to me, Smucker. You've never been either faithful or efficient. God knows why I didn't fire you years ago. I suppose those hard-luck stories you used to spring whenever you were in danger saved you. You told me less than a month ago the same old yarn about paying installments on your house and looking after an old father. Don't interrupt! Your house was paid for three years ago, and your old father is night watchman on some docks near where you live. Your three elder children keep themselves and help support the home. Probably you are comfortably fixed."

Smucker raised his voice.

"Mr. Hanby, I won't be fired without a good reason!"

"You've not even been honest," continued Hanby. "There are petty cash irregularities that can be gone into if you wish it, and certain losses of postage stamps. If you are wise, you won't irritate me any longer."

Smucker withdrew. So they had found out about him! What a trick for a rich man like Hanby, to be watching when an old employee used an office stamp for his private correspondence!

When he was much excited, there were noises in Mr. Smucker's head as if things about to burst. What a day there would be when the intellectuals controlled the workers and enslaved the capitalists! He had been one of those who believed that Lenin was to be the savior of America. Lenin had died, but others would be raised up. Smucker's visions of vengeance were stupendous. They died down a little when he reflected that he must face that sound domestic economist, Mrs. Adolf. He drew his month's unearned salary vindictively.

At eleven o'clock Bill Pelham, summoned by telephone, sauntered into Hanby's office. He was a slight man, above middle height, with dark hair and eyes. His was a tired, lined face—the face of a man to whom success has not come. No man was closer to him than Hanby.

"How's the dog market, Bill?" Hanby asked.

"I don't know; but my business is going to the dogs, if that's what you mean. We can't all guess where the wheel is going to stop. Sorry I couldn't get to your dinner party last night. Dina rang me up and told me that my absence was the only blemish."

"That's a fact, Bill." Hanby looked at him keenly. "You don't relish this country life idea?"

"It's a tragedy to me." Pelham groaned. "Your home is my home. You let me come when I want to and leave when I want to. You ask no vain questions, and my grouches never make you angry. I don't know what the devil I shall do. You've been blessed above all the men I know. Your girls are pretty and popular, and yet they don't go guzzling gin with chauffeurs. Your boy is popular, and yet he keeps clean. I've often thought the Hanby family was sent to show that decency was possible even in this jazz life we lead. Do I relish your going? Don't make a jest of it!"

"You'll be at the Gray house, too. You can't drop out of our lives, so don't anticipate it. Funny place, the Gray house! I suppose you read that my caretaker was murdered last night?"

"Haven't seen the morning papers. Tell me about it."

"A puzzling crime," commented Pelham, when he had heard all that his friend knew.

"I may be next," Hanby said, wondering how long Bill could maintain this air of complete innocence. "Poor Dina a widow, with the chance of marrying a better man!"

"Don't!" said Bill, frowning. "I don't like to hear you make a joke of that sort of thing. If Dina died, could you ever marry again?"

"Good G—d, no! Of course not!" replied Hanby, startled.

"She couldn't either. Hil, old man, don't you know that every now and again in this human family two people are born like Dina and you—two people whom nothing can separate but death? I've watched you with other women, and I've watched her with other men—pretty women, too, —and better-looking cusses than you. Tell me, have you ever seen a woman you care a d—n for since you met Dina?"

"No."

"And she's seen no other man. You two are marvels. That family of yours is what it is because of its parents."

"I didn't mean that about Dina marrying," Hanby said, a little shamefacedly. "You know men don't like to seem sentimental. Your friendship has been a great deal to us, Bill, and you are not going to drop out."

"I worship Dina," Bill Pelham said meditatively. "Directly I saw her, twenty years ago, I knew that she was the one woman." He smiled whimsically. "Every Christmas she lets me kiss her under the mistletoe. Once every year! You can bet I shall be with you on Christmas eve, anyway."

Hanby smiled.

"If we lived in some European countries, I should have to challenge you to a duel for that and kill you."

"It's the dark, saturnine villain who does the slaying," Bill reminded him. "I should sneer diabolically, and ask you to name the rib under which you would like my rapier to go." He lighted a cigarette. "Why did you ask me to come?"

"To discuss your Aunt Selina."

"How the devil did you know I had an Aunt Selina? She was a great-grandaunt, a playmate of Martha Washington, if the family history is correct."

"I didn't know it. Look here, Bill—Dina's all upset about some merry spirits who have been trying to frighten me away from Pine Plains. Do you admit coming here and pretending to be Miss Selenos, who hated and despised me above all men, and pinned her faith on dogs?"

"One of us is crazy," replied Bill Pelham. "At the time you say I was here, a dozen men will prove that I was in Chicago. I have played practical jokes, and I hope to again, if I live; but I know nothing of this. Tell me all."

Hanby described not only his experience but that of Adolf Smucker.

"You can count Reggie out, too," Pelham declared. "He's at the bankers' convention in Baltimore. These two people may be fakes, but Reggie and I are innocent. Silly sort of stories to tell!"

"That's what Dina said."

"Is she worried?"

"Just a little. Nothing physical can scare her, but she takes funny psychological excursions. She was reading an English book on 'Haunted Houses' when I left."

"There are such things," Pelham said, gravely. "Glamis castle, for one, and the house where the Wesleys lived. I don't know enough to disbelieve. Look here, Hil—we've got to get to the bottom of this."

"What do you suggest?"

"I've got a clear day. I'll interview the man you bought the place from, and find out about past tenants. Also, I'll see if there was a Selenos family holding land grants in California. I'll probably drop in after dinner. Where are you off to?" concluded Pelham, as Hanby reached for his hat.

"Pine Plains. Junior is motoring me up. I'll be back by dinner time, with luck. Anyhow, wait for me. I've got to see about another caretaker and arrange for the burial of Kerr. Not a cent was found on him, and it seems that he has no relations. I feel responsible, in a way. Junior seems to think that he's going to be a Sherlock Holmes, to the chagrin and confusion of the Pine Plains police."

"There is no such thing as a meaningless crime." Pelham remarked. "Junior may be of some help."

"I hope so. I want to clear up everything, so that Dina and Celia won't have a chance to feel nervous. Dina has a vague idea that the country is dangerous. She was raised in Cleveland's most select residential district, and has always lived in cities. I'm a wild man from the Housatonic feud country, and the idea of tramps doesn't give me a thrill at all."

"If I know Dina," Bill said thoughtfully, "she'll be less worried about tramps than she will about any reputed curse on the place. Like many of those highly strung women, she's psychically sensitive. If all these tragedies happened there, she's bound to hear of them. You've already had a murder on your front lawn."

"That's not serious," Hanby returned. "Some wandering yegg killed the poor fellow for his savings."

"I wish you hadn't sent that Selenos woman off without getting more particulars from her. You calmly shut all avenues of information."

"Her manner was so infernally insulting, Bill. You know I'm not the sort of man to be told that I must sell the house I've selected as a home after inspecting hundreds of places. The poor old thing was crazy."

"What about Smucker?"

"Hooch talked there. Smucker's not too well balanced, either."

Bill Pelham shook his head.

"I don't like it," he said.

Who Has Missing Half of Cullinan Diamond?

When the Cullinan diamond, the largest in the world, estimated to be worth up to $25,000,000, and which is among the British crown jewels, was dug from the earth at the Premier mines at Cullinan, South Africa, in 1905, it was found that one side was so flat and smooth that it was considered to be only part of a much bigger diamond. The enormous half brother, however, has never been found, although scientists, diamond miners, financiers, geologists and thieves have been searching for it for twenty-three years. Its whereabouts and even its existence are one of the world's mysteries.

South Africa abounds with strange stories of the missing half of the Cullinan diamond. One version is that it was found by a native worker in the diamond mines who feared to dispose of it because of the strict law governing the illicit selling of stones. A notorious criminal once almost had his hands on it, the story goes, but he attempted to trick the native who was prepared to sell it to him and the native fled with the diamond.

Growth of Air Force

Before the close of the World war, the United States navy had an air force overseas comprising 400 planes, fifty kite balloons and three dirigibles, operated by a personnel of about 1,100 officers and 18,000 enlisted men. Its pilots had flown approximately 1,000,000 miles, including 6,600 miles of war flights over areas infested by submarines. This large organization was developed from a nucleus of six officers and sixty-three enlisted men who landed at Pauillac, France, in June, 1917.

So Few Women Understand

Yet Feminine Hygiene is the foundation of health and charm!

THE rapid aging of many women so soon after marriage, according to medical authorities, is the direct result of ignorance on the subject of feminine hygiene. This is an established medical fact, which any physician will substantiate.

Even when informed as to the importance of feminine hygiene, women have been reluctant to dabble with dangerous poisons, douches, etc.

Now, however, through the use of a new antiseptic in tablet form, which requires no water, syringes, or other accessories, the modern American women of today are fast learning the convenience of feminine hygiene.

Science's Gift to Women

These tablets are known as Pariogen tablets. For a long time prescribed by the medical profession, Pariogen is not a poison, contains no carbolic acid, cresol or bichloride of mercury, yet destroys the most pernicious germs in a few moments.

Pariogen tablets come twelve to the tube—a tube about the size of a fountain pen. The price at any drug store is $1.00. Pariogen tablets may be carried anywhere in a purse or vest pocket making hygienic measures possible almost anywhere, no other accessories or water being necessary.

If your druggist is unable to supply you, or if you prefer to send direct, the coupon below and a dollar bill will bring you a full size tube of Pariogen tablets, together with a booklet on Feminine Hygiene and its importance.

If, for any reason, you do not wish to keep them, just return whatever remains and we will promptly refund your dollar together with postage. Send the coupon now and learn how to protect yourself against the many menaces to your health and charm that ignorance on feminine hygiene invites.

And in performance—Pontiac owners ask no favors of any other car in its field

TRUE PUBLIC OWNERSHIP

OWNERSHIP of our public utility enterprises is not held by a few individuals. The electric power industry has been a pioneer in permitting the small investor to enjoy the benefits formerly reserved for the capitalist.

Today public service companies are rapidly becoming great community enterprises owned by the employees, customers and general public, who have thus invested their savings.

This is true "Public Ownership", but without the evils of "Political Operation".

H. O. Hanson, Publisher. Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota; Friday, May 17, 1929. Volume 19; Number 3.

Over 400 boys and girls from thirteen northwestern Minnesota counties will attend Annual Club Short Course to be held at the Northwest School of Agriculture, Crookston, June 10 to 13. This course, which is open to any boy or girl between the ages of twelve and twenty years, offers an unusual opportunity to secure information concerning all 4—H Club projects, as well as problems of the farm and home. Many club members have already reserved rooms. One local leader with thirty-two members writes that every member of the club plans to attend.

Students arriving Monday afternoon or evening will be met by the Northwest School bus and taken direct to the Administration building for registration and room assignments. Supper will be served at six o'clock, followed by a program of community singing, and movies in the auditorium.

Instructors will include Georgia Rose of the Kerr Glass Manufacturing company, who will give a number of fruit and vegetable canning demonstrations; Ruth McManus of the Russel Miller Milling Company, who will demonstrate bread baking, and the making of quick breads, and pastry; Fannie Buchanan of the Victor Talking Machine Company; Dean Rundlett, Editor of "Fins, Furs and Feathers", and a member of the State Game and Fish Department; H. A. Pflughoeft, District Club leader; Miss Fanny Lippitt, Miss Retta Bede, R. S. Dunham, E. R. clark, T. M. McCall, O. M. Kiser, D. H. LaVoi, A. M. Foker and A. M. Pilkey of the Northwest School.

The entire cost of board, room and entertainment will be $3.00. All students should bring necessary bedding. For additional information, write "Northwest School of Agriculture, Crookston.

Men have been known to make flowery nominating speeches at political conventions and then to sit down without mentioning the name of their candidate. Others have written letters, some of them carrying money, and forgotten to sign them. So it is not to be wondered at that among thousands of persons who order bulletins issued by the department of agriculture, University of Minnesota, some fail to fill in the lines on the announcement cards giving name and address.

Several unsigned orders have been received recently at the mailing room at University Farm. If your bulletins do not appear promptly do not assume that your order has been overlooked, but rather that in your haste you neglected to sign on the ruled line or anywhere else.

A number of thefts have been reported by our subscribers resently. The large number of these point unmistakably to the fact that thieves are planning a big season. No doubt they have met in convention, passed resolutions and adopted as their slogan for 1929 "Bigger and Better Hauls."

The Legislature did not adopt the proposed amendment to the traffic law requiring pedestrians on the highways to walk on the left side. It is a good safety rule, nevertheless. Persons walking on the right side cannot see approching vehicles and the driver often does not know what the pedestrian is going to do. If the driver turns out to pass them, he runs the risk of a collision with other cars coming the other way. If he cannot turn out, the pedestrian may be hit.

Walking on the left side enables the pedestrian to see approaching cars and protect himself. In refusing to enact this rule into law, the Legislature did not mean to imply that it was not a good rule, but the members simply felt that matters of this kind can be handled better by education than by "passing a law."

The Carlson Mercantile Company who own a chain of five up to date stores along this line will stage a drive for bigger business commencing May 20th and continuing throughout this month.

Marriage statistics of South Africa record the wedding of one centenarian and four other men, each more than ninety-five years of age. Three hundred bridegrooms of eighty-five and over are mentioned, as well as three centenarian brides.

Inquiries about Minnesota farm lands are coming in to the office of the Ten Thousand Lakes-Greater Minnesota Association at an increasing rate, officials of that organization reported this week.

During the past month alone, 501 different persons from other states wrote to the Association for information about farming opportunities in Minnesota, indicating that they were considering coming to Minnesota to live. Virtually all sections of the United States, and even foreign countries were represented among those who sought information about Minnesota's agricultural resources.

"Minnesota has agricultural resources which few states can equal. Farmers all over the country right now are looking for oppotunities such as we can offer, and if we advertise them, many will come to Minnesota,"

Short Lessons in Dairying

LESSON 62

PRODUCTION: A production of 25 pounds of butterfat per cow for the month is considered good in Cow Testing Association work. If you milked 10 cows last month and sold 250 pounds of butterfat at the creamery, that is 25 lbs of fat per cow, that is good. Using this as a basis, you can tell how the cows are doing any time by dividing the number of pounds of fat sold for the month by the number of cows milked.

MANUFACTURING: A co-operative creamery can manufacture butter at around 3 cents per pound(2½ to 3½ cents) when making from three to four hundred thousand pounds of butter a year. A creamery manufacturing this amount of butter can pay as much for butterfat as can be paid, if, all other conditions are right at the creamery.

MARKETING: A comparison of marketing butterfat thru co-operative creameries, or thru cream stations show that co-operative creameries on an average pay 5 cents more per pound butterfat, and the first-class co-operative creameries pay 8 cents more.

Castoria is a comfort when Baby is fretful. No sooner taken than the little one is at ease. If restless, a few drops soon bring contentment. No harm done, for Castoria is a baby remedy, meant for babies. Perfectly safe to give the youngest infant; you have the doctors' word for that! Pork and Longevity

William Walker, who is believed to be England's oldest man, has just attained the age of one hundred and seven. He celebrated the day quietly at his home at Nottingham. His slogan is "Eat pork and live long," and his gifts included many forms of his favorite dish. "I have heard," he said, "that a monkey gland makes people young again, but why be 'monkeyed' with when there's plenty of pork, and there are more pigs than monkeys."

What the Gray House Hid

The Mystery of a Haunted Mansion

by Wyndham Martyn

W. N. U. SERVICE
Copyright by Wyndham Martyn

THE STORY

Hilton Hanby, prosperous New York merchant, has purchased a country place—the Gray house, near Pine Plains. Miss Selenos, a former tenant of the Gray house, calls at his office and warns him that the house is under a curse. Further alarming details are impressed upon Adolf Smucker, Hanby's secretary, by a man who claims to have been chauffeur for Sir Stanford Seymour, former occupant of the place. The Hanbys laugh off the warnings they have received both from Miss Selenos and from Smucker's acquaintance, as some form of practical joke. But they are shocked when they hear that the caretaker whom they have put in charge of the Gray house, a man named Kerr, has been mysteriously murdered. Hanby consults his friend Pelham.

CHAPTER III

At the real-estate offices of Douglas & Smith, Pelham was referred by Douglas, whom he knew, to a Mr. Appleton.

"Appleton will tell you everything," said Douglas. "He has an amazing memory for details, and a great affection for the Gray house. Come into my office when you're through."

Frederick Appleton was a small plump man of sixty. He had a distinguished conservatism in dress, a florid complexion, and blue eyes which looked more than usually large owing to the thickness and power of the lenses he wore. After a little preliminary talk, Pelham judged him to be one of those men in relatively unimportant offices who bring to their tasks a certain not unpleasing pomposness.

"I have in this book," said Mr. Appleton, pointing to a ledger, "a complete record of the tenants and the expenses of the Gray house for almost thirty-five years. Here you will find the cost of the upkeep of house, grounds, and stables. In my head I have many facts concerning the people who have resided there, which would be out of place in the books of a strictly business firm."

"I take it, then," said Pelham, "that you have an unusual interest in mankind?"

Mr. Appleton's shrewd but kindly face beamed.

"We see a great deal more in this line of work than you would suppose. Oh, dear me, yes! Do I understand that Mr. Hanby desires information about the place?"

"Yes, and Mr. Douglas said that you could tell me everything. He is a close personal friend of Mr. Hanby."

Mr. Appleton's eyes grew a little harder.

"So I inferred from the fact that the sale was not made through me. I knew that Mr. Hanby was interested in the Gray house, but I admit being staggered when Mr. Douglas made the announcement that it was sold."

It was clear to Pelham that the other man was chagrined. No doubt it was the allowable annoyance of an old and trusted employee, who having been consulted for so long, is suddenly left out of the firm's confidence in the sale of a property.

"Not that I am criticizing Mr. Douglas," the other went on. "Oh, dear me, no!" His manner was brisk and cheerful again. "What can I do for you, Mr. Pelham?"

"Did you ever know a Miss Selenos?"

"She occupied the Gray house for three years. I remember her well. Poor lady, she loathed and despised men, particularly your humble servant. We had to evict her for non payment of rent. She had ample warning, but we had to call the sheriff in. May I ask how you know her?"

"She called on Mr. Hanby and threatened him with all sorts of wild vengeances if he did not sell the place to her."

There was no doubt about Mr. Appleton's interest now.

"I can quite believe it," he said. "I remember that when we put her out she said that I should be dead within the year. I may say that my good wife was very much relieved when the twelvemonth had passed. I hear that she has at last inherited the great Selenos fortune. They were land-poor for many years."

"You think she's not normal?"

"Insanity in the family," said Mr. Appleton firmly. "The things she said to me were most indelicate, and could only be explained by madness of a hereditary type." The speaker hesitated for a moment. "I suppose she did not mention my name?"

"I think not. I suppose you remember Mr. Seymour?"

"Now Sir Stanford Seymour. Oh, dear me, yes! I ventured to call upon him when in England two years ago. The tragedy had left its mark on Sir Stanford, but he was always a reserved type."

"What tragedy?"

"His two sons were drowned in the lake."

"Who was the previous tenant?"

"Mr. John Throckmorton. His wife died at the Gray house. A lovely woman! I went to the funeral. Very sad indeed. The lake again."

"It seems to have been a house of death," Pelham commented. He did not relish the idea of the Hanby family inhabiting it as much as he had done. "Who came after Sir Stanford Seymour?"

"He sublet it—subject to our approval, of course—to Mr. Crosby Norton. Mr. Norton lost his four children."

"In that same d—d lake?"

"I regret to say yes." Mr. Appleton looked shrewdly at his visitor. "Have you much influence with Mr. Hilton Hanby?"

"I am his closest friend."

"Do you suppose that you could influence him to reconsider his purchase?" Mr. Appleton was considerate and sympathetic. "I am not a believer in haunted houses. I try to be skeptical in such matters, but there seems to be a strange fate about the Gray house. It always takes toll of the young and happy. Those Seymour children, for example—high-bred, strong, happy boys who could swim excellently; yet they are dead, and at Sir Stanford's death his title goes to a distant cousin. Then the Norton children, three girls and a boy—the lake got them, too. I tell myself it was a coincidence. Perhaps! Perhaps!" His manner grew more confidential. "Tell me, Mr. Pelham, did you ever hear such a chain of coincidences as that?"

Mr. Appleton's Eyes Grew a Little Harder.

"It's most disturbing news," admitted Pelham.

"It seems to me," said the other "that if these unhappy facts were duly brought to Mr. Hanby's notice, he could not disregard them. No doubt Miss Selenos' manner annoyed him, and he disregarded her story on that account; yet"—Appleton tapped the big ledger—"the facts are all down here in my own handwriting."

"I'm afraid whatever I said would make him all the more determined to go. He is a skeptic, and opposition makes him ready to fight. I don't think anything would make him give it up."

"I have done my duty, then," said Appleton briskly. "No doubt he is right, and these deaths were due to lack of care. I have here a letter, with estimate inclosed, from a Pine Plains carpenter, who agreed to put the rustic bridge in order. That bridge, Mr. Pelham, crossed the lake at its deepest part. The Seymour boys were fishing from it when it gave way. I rather think the Norton children were found near there, too."

Appleton turned to the estimate.

"You see, Mr. Pelham, these tragedies might have been averted if the owner had seen fit to expend sixty-four dollars and eighteen cents. It was owing to my influence that the lake was completely filled in, and the stream feeding it was diverted to the lower lake. Instead of five acres of water filled with stumps, which made fishing difficult, Mr. Hanby has now a twenty-acre lake with good bass and trout in it and not a pickerel to do damage. I have fished there every year, and I know. I wonder if Mr. Hanby would extend the courtesy to me?"

"I'll answer for him," said Pelham. "I'm a fisherman myself. Thank you for what you've told me."

"Well?" Douglas asked, a little later. "Get what you wanted?"

"And more," said Pelham. "The Gray house has a dismal atmosphere about it, to my way of thinking. Appleton seems to think that for less than sixty-five dollars all those lives might have been saved."

"I think he's right," said the other. "The old lake was within a few yards of the house, and very deep. It was too much of a temptation to children. The banks were steep, too, as I recall them."

"Then you don't believe in the curse theory?"

Douglas lighted a cigar before answering Pelham's question.

"In my office, during business hours, the idea seems silly; but sometimes, when I can't sleep at night, I'm not so sure. I've Highland blood in my veins, remember, and race memories of haunted houses, and curses that descend from generation to generation. Don't ask me, Bill."

"You give me the same sort of comfort that Appleton does. He tells me what curdles my blood, and then explains it all away by a carpenter's estimate that missed the mark."

It was not a very comfortable motor trip for the Hanbys. When Junior drove, his father thanked God that his will was made and his affairs were in order. When Hanby was at the wheel, his son struggled between a feeling of pride that his progenitor still had his nerve left, and a fear that never again would be tread the campus at New Haven.

"Corking road!" Junior commented, when Pine Plains was in sight.

"Was it a road?" his father demanded. "I'm relieved to know that. I thought it was a race track."

"Where's the Gray house?"

"We passed it on the last lap."

"You might have pointed it out to me," remarked young Hanby.

"Why? I thought, as we went by, that neither of us would ever have the opportunity to inhabit it."

Junior laughed.

"This old bus can certainly clip off the milestones!"

"Don't boast. You only scratched the one you hit."

"It beats me," his son remarked philosophically, "why cows don't know their own minds. I didn't dream that beast was going to give us a race."

"Slow down, Junior!" his sire commanded. "We've got to stand well in this community."

Hilton Hanby stepped from the car, to be greeted by the local police chief and an officer from Kingston.

"This is my son, Sherlock Gaboriau Hanby," he said. "Is the inquest over?"

"Yes," said the local man. "I wish you'd been here before."

"Any clew to the murderer?" Junior asked.

"Not a one."

Junior smiled. He knew exactly how it would be.

"But there's a mighty interesting development. This fellow Kerr wasn't Kerr at all. He had a whole string of aliases. We finger-printed him, and fitted the right name to him. Your caretaker, Mr. Hanby, was Red Chapin, wanted for 'most everything up to murder."

"That's interesting," Hanby exclaimed. "A murderer murdered!"

He was not pleased to think that such a man had been in his employ, although engaged by an agent.

"His references was stolen from some Spanish war veteran named Kerr. We'll find out all about it soon. Also he had Kerr's discharge papers and a medal. Want to look at him, sir?"

"Not on your life!" said Hanby, who detested morbid things.

"I'd like to," Junior suggested.

Commerce Boomed by Methods of Counting

For ages even the most intelligent men could count only to ten or twenty, the number of their fingers and toes. Then sticks and stone counters were laid in rows to indicate and compute numbers involved in barter and trade. In the earliest civilizations symbols were employed to some extent, then in Egypt they had the happy thought of drawing a picture to represent each quantity. Thus, a frog equaled 100,000 and a man with arms outstretched in admiration signified 10,000,000. The Greek and Roman systems of letters for numerals were considered a great advance, but only the most learned could do any adding or subtracting with them. The decimal system was brought by an ambassador from India into Arabia in 773 A. D., and European countries got their numerals from Arabia in the Twelfth century. It proved popular right away and teachers of the new system were in great demand. Trade and industry, so long dammed up by a lack of any simple method of keeping accounts or doing business with persons at a distance, sprang into life—and the Commercial era was born.—Detroit News.

Pit Pony's Wisdom

In the old workings of a Rhondda Valley mine, in Wales, a pony hauling its coal wagon suddenly dug his heels in and refused to budge. While the miner with it was vainly trying to coax it to go on, a big piece of roof fell with a crash in front of them.

Cop Goes to Cell in Girl's Place

Pittsburgh.—Patrolman Fahart Saba wasn't quite clear as to just what law was being violated when a young girl resisted his wooing, but he was sure it either was against "the law or ought to have been." So when Miss Katherine Certich rebuffed him after the two returned from an automobile trip he arrested her.

He took her to the North Side police station and then encountered an obstacle. Saba never had heard of the crime "lese majeste" and wasn't sure if it was on the statute books, even if he had heard of it. He took his problem to Captain Block in order to find out with just what crime the girl should be charged. Captain Block listened to the patrolman, he listened to the girl and then he ordered the cop locked up. Saba was fined $10.

"RED" CAGLE FINDS HE'S ONLY CADET

Football Star Must Pay for Breaking Rules.

West Point, N. Y.—Back of the grim gray quadrangle in West Point Christian K. ("Red") Cagle, the army's great all-American halfback and the cadet corps' hero, must do a dreary penance with the nimble feet that won him fame. Every Wednesday and Saturday he must march, strictly at attention, until he has hammered out his penalty on the hard gravel for 22 hours.

He does it on his own time and he does not complain, although it bars him from track competition this year. All his extra and precious minutes must be spent marching up and down a 100-yard stretch of gravel, because he broke the inflexible regulations of West Point.

The captain of next fall's Army football team owes his dilemma to missing a boat at Hoboken. He was supposed to catch it. It was a breach of discipline. In the eyes of the West Point faculty, there is no "Red" Cagle, meteoric football star. There is only Cadet Cagle, second classman, Second battalion.

As he strides, hour after hour, executing a snappy "to the rear march!" at each end of the 100-yard stretch, his bearing is a little proud, for he is proving that he is fit to be an officer and a gentleman, as he will become by act of congress when he is graduated. He is proving that a potential officer of the United States army can accept harsh discipline as unflinchingly, as later he may pass it out.

"Red's" offense was comparatively trivial, if any offense can be so regarded in West Point. Cagle came to New York city recently with a party of cadets on an educational trip. This particular mission was a visit to the Museum of Natural History. The cadets on the party were dismissed late in the afternoon. They were granted their freedom until 11:45 p. m., when they were to board the 11:45 p. m. Weehawken ferry for transport to Jersey in time to catch the midnight train for West Point.

What the dashing football star did with his liberty is not known. But it seems that he left himself too little time to reach the ferry.

Refused Divorce, Man Kills Sweetheart, Self

Columbus, Ohio.—E. E. Welsh chose death for himself and his young sweetheart rather than continue the four-year illicit love affair which he believed never would be legalized.

Welsh's body and that of his stenographer sweetheart, Eleanor Porter, were found in his motor car near New Albany.

On her finger—the engagement finger—was a cameo ring he had given her. In another box in his pocket was a gold wedding band, which he could not legally give to the girl because he already was married and his wife refused to divorce him.

Welsh, forty-three, was auditor and secretary of the Gwinn Milling company. He had a fifteen-year-old daughter and up to four years ago the family had appeared happy.

Several months ago Welsh and his wife separated.

A farmer discovered the two bodies in Welsh's motor car. Coroner Joseph Murphy said there was no question that Welsh had killed the girl and then committed suicide.

Bandit Kills Victim; Car Driven by Woman

Chicago.—A bandit with a blond woman chauffeur stepped out of a sedan on the South side and aimed a sawed-off shotgun at Harry Winters and Arthur Leland as they drew up in another car with a payroll for the H. E. Robinson Roofing company. Winters made a move as though to resist and the bandit killed him. He then took $780 away from Leland and re-entered the sedan, which sped away.

WHAT DR. CALDWELL LEARNED IN 47 YEARS PRACTICE

A physician watched the results of constipation for 47 years, and believed that no matter how careful people are of their health, diet and exercise, constipation will occur from time to time. Of next importance, then, is how to treat it when it comes. Dr. Caldwell always was in favor of getting as close to nature as possible, hence his remedy for constipation, known as Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, is a mild vegetable compound. It can not harm the system and is not habit forming. Syrup Pepsin is pleasant-tasting, and youngsters love it.

Dr. Caldwell did not approve of drastic physics and purges. He did not believe they were good for anybody's system. In a practice of 47 years he never saw any reason for their use when Syrup Pepsin will empty the bowels just as promptly.

Do not let a day go by without a bowel movement. Do not sit and hope but go to the nearest druggist and get one of the generous bottles of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, or write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. BB, Monticello, Illinois, for free trial bottle.

THE LESSON HE LEARNED

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

FOR three days Wally had not seen Bill. Had he got another job, Wally wondered? Almost on the thought Bill's younger brother, Roy, hurried past the corner, going somewhere in a rush.

Wally hailed him peremptorily and Roy stopped with a jerk, looking vaguely about for the voice. What was the matter with Roy, anyhow? Wally rolled his chair and the attached stand a little nearer to the corner and called again. Roy came over—a sallow boy of sixteen with dim blue eyes. He was a sharp contrast to the rolling, jovial, brown-eyed Bill.

"What you want, Wally?" asked Roy. "I gotta hurry."

"First time I ever saw you in a hurry. Where's Bill these days?"

"Bill? Oh, yes——Bill," and Roy fumbled with the battered arm-rest of Wally's chair.

Wally opened his mouth for some derisive comment on this foolish reply—and closed it again. Roy's groping hand was shaking. Wally clutched his arm.

"Kid, has anything happened to Bill?"

"Yeh—kind of."

"Whadda you mean—kind of?"

"Why, he's sick. Honest, I gotta go, Wally. He'll maybe be wantin' something."

"Sick, what with? You gotta tell me, kid!"

"I don't know what it is! It's an awful pain in the middle of him. Doctor says he should be operated quick."

"Well, ain't he—?"

"We ain't got enough money!" wailed Roy, and one or two passing heads turned around at the sound. "The boys at the warehouse scraped up every dollar they could and Bill's boss give twenty-five—borried it at the bank—his wife's in the hospital but he said Bill was like a son—and old Mrs. Haley give ten. But it ain't enough!" His voice broke. "I gotta go, Wally!"

On the word he dashed across the street under the noses of two startled horses and a furious motorman.

Wally glanced along the four traffic lanes and spied a blue uniform half a block away. "Here, kid," he hailed a newsboy, "this dime is yours if you tell that cop he's needed at this corner in a hurry."

In a few minutes the policeman came with long strides. "What's up, Wally?"

"Taner, you know Bill Folsom, what drives that van for the warehouse?"

"Big Bill? Sure."

"Well, Taner, he's down sick in bed, real bad, and I gotta see to something for him right away. Will you keep an eye on my stand?"

"You bet Wally. Just unhook. I'll shove her back."

Wally detached his wheel-chair from his stand, a sort of little store from which he sold chewing gums, tobacco and sealed candies. The policeman pushed it against the wall of the building as Wally trundled himself quickly around the corner.

He was just in time to get into the bank. Half a dozen friendly greetings met him as he rolled down to the W window. The men wondered at his unusual haste.

"Mr. Bekins," he spoke to the teller. "I want to draw out my hundred and seventy dollars, in cash."

Bekins peered down through the brass bars, clearly perplexed. He knew what Wally had been saving money for. They had joked together every time in the last three years that he had come in to make a deposit, and Bekins had rejoiced nearly as much as Wally as the sum had approached the peak. In just one month more there would be enough to buy the new stand and the comfortable chair, all rubber-tired and fitted with roller-bearings. Wally had confessed that sometimes the old chair was "powerful tiresome."

"But, Great Scott, Wally—" Bekins could not keep back the protest.

"If you had a friend," said Wally, "would you think twict?"

Bekins turned promptly. "Paper or gold, Wally?"

All the next day Wally felt warm and happy. His content must have communicated itself to the passersby, for he sold himself out of goods three times. Bill was to be operated on at two o'clock and Wally had not the slightest doubt of a successful issue. Of course, he would come out all right. Bill always did, even that time he turned over in the arroyo with a grand piano, the time the bridge gave way. Nothing could go very wrong with Bill.

Wally could not have formulated what it was about Bill that made people love him. Maybe it was because he was just so spilling over with health and energy and good will. Morning after morning, for two years now, Wally had listened for his voice, had watched for his great, swaying van, as it swung around Wally's corner. Why, he seemed to hear Bill's voice this afternoon, as the rush hour began and the five o'clock crowds commenced pouring down the avenue.

"Moving out the boulevard today, Wally?" That was Bill's best joke. He always maintained that Wally should ply his trade along the bridlepaths and sell all-day suckers to the flappers. And at night, a tired but grinning Bill, he would stop and buy gum or candy for the "kids"—the younger brother and sister that he supported.

That was all Wally had ever seen of Bill, that morning and evening contact on a crowded corner. To Wally it was more precious that fine gold. The big truck driver never treated Wally one bit differently from anyone else, never tainted their relationship with any condescension or pity, never appeared the least aware of the twisted shrunken body. He seemed, somehow, to make a complete man of Wally, to stand him upon his spiritual feet, let him walk upright.

Wally whistled merrily as he pushed his stand toward a basement entrance, to the jingle of a full cash drawer.

Then somebody came and said it. Bill had died on the operating-table at 2:30.

All night long Wally lay wide awake, staring out at the stars that wheeled slowly past his alley window. All night long a phrase beat in his head, dully, like a slack drum. "Bill won't never come again—never again—never again—never again."

Wally thought he couldn't go to his corner in the morning. He thought he would cry like a baby if the big van should come around the corner with a new driver at the wheel.

But he went, and somehow got through the blank day. Late in the afternoon he noticed Taner standing not far from him. Had Taner heard about Bill, Wally wondered. He suddenly wanted somebody to talk to, somebody to mourn with him. Taner knew Bill, knew how great he was.

As if pulled by that intense desire of Wally's the policeman walked over to the stand and stood looking down at him. But the query died on Wally's lips. There was something in Taner's face—was he thinking of Bill?

Taner, meeting the questioning sympathy in Wally's glance, spoke, though he had not meant to. "My little girl's sick, Wally. She's awful sick."

"That cute little yellow-haired one, Taner?"

Taner nodded, and for an instant his mouth trembled.

"What's the matter with her? asked Wally. "And when did she take down?"

Taner told it all, pouring out his troubled heart, struggling grimly to keep a hand on himself. The long day away from home, without a word, the terror of loss had nearly unmanned him.

"I'll bet she'll be all right, Taner," Wally tried to cheer him. "Why, of course she will! You just been thinkin' and lettin' it get your goat, man. You'll go home in half an hour, now, and I'll lay you a dime she's better!"

Taner managed a grin. "I won't take you up. But it was good to spill it to some one, Wally." He was gone to untangle a traffic snarl.

Wally watched him for a few minutes, then turned to his own trouble, to receive a surprised jolt.

"Why—by crickey, I feel better! Why—why that's the way I can make it up to Bill, for all he done for me! Why—!" As the possibilities of the idea opened, vista-like, before him, he gasped. "I can joke and laugh, like him, and—and make people smile and—I ain't no good to look at, of course, like him, but—but Taner did feel better—By crickey!"

Racial Pride Carried Situation for Adams

When John Adams went to Versailles as ambassador he had supper with the king and queen and was a little nervous because he could neither speak nor understand the French language in a manner to support a conversation. "But I soon had the satisfaction to find it was a silent meeting and that nobody spoke a word but the royal family to each other, and they said very little. The eyes of all the assembly were turned upon me, and I felt sufficiently humble and mortified, for I was not a proper object for the criticisms of such a company. I found myself gazed at, as we in America used to gaze at the sachems who come to make speeches to us in congress; but I thought it very hard if I could not command as much power of face as one of the chiefs of the Six Nations, and therefore determined that I should assume a cheerful countenance, enjoy the scene around me, and observe it as coolly as an astronomer contemplates the stars."—Detroit News.

Bridge Needs Much Paint

A fierce fight has been needed to keep the mighty Forth bridge from rusting away, and 30 painters are continuously coating it with preservatives. Fifty tons of paint are used in covering the mile and a half long bridge. Three years are taken to finish this huge task, which must then be started over again

But this ceaseless work has been rewarded by the perfect condition of the bridge today, for after 46 years of continuous exposure to the elements it is still the only bridge in the world over which expresses can thunder at 60 miles an hour.—London Tit-Bits.

New Word in Language

Progress in science and industry is constantly demanding new terms and one of the latest of these is the word "decibel," coined by telephone engineers to describe the efficiency of telephone circuits, says Popular Mechanics Magazine. It is a substitute for the phrase "transmission unit."

The American Legion Poppy

In the spring of 1919, after the war, on Flanders Field, where the firing had been terrific and thousands of our boys had fallen in battle, in the midst of devastation, the poppies came up in abundance. The French women tell you to day that the poppy is signified of the blood of the boys who fell in Flanders Field. Those who have traveled in France since the war tell us it is peculiarly true that where the battle was the fiercest and the greatest, the poppies to this day grow most profuse Because of this close association to the supreme sacrifice made by the boys, the poppy has become the memorial flower of the American Legion and Auxiliary.

These poppies are made by the disabled soldiers in hospitals and every penny paid for poppies is spent for the benefit of the disabled ex-service men and their dependents.

We believe the citizens of Holt and community will find a real satisfaction in buying and wearing this little flower which recalls so vividly the sacrifices made by the boys in Flanders Field. So, do your bit! Buy a poppy on Saturday, May 25th.

New Publication Announced

Beautifully illustrated and containing a great amount of data of interest to persons considering locating in Minnesota, a new agriculture booklet has just been completed and is now being distributed throughout the nation by the Ten Thousand Lakes-Greater Minnesota Association.

The new publication contains 16 pages of text and pictorial matter. It is enclosed in a cover which is beautifully illustrated in four colors. It reviews in detail the progress made in various lines of agricultureal endeavor and shows opportunities open to farmers who cast their lot in the North Star State. Pictures from many Minnesota farms are used to aid in telling the story of the state's varied agricultural resources.

"Minnesota's agricultural products last year were worth $683,663,000, a remarkable showing when it is considered that this is one of the newer states," the book states. "It is only 75 years since the first surveyed land was opened for settlement.

Now there are more than 188,000 farms in the state. In the period between 1920 and 1925 Minnesota showed the greatest gain in number of farms of any state in the northern half of the United States. During this period 9,753 new farms were added.

Short Lessons in Dairying

LESSON 63

PRODUCTION: A shortage of feed in the early spring causes many losses. Production goes down, cows eat partially decayed feed that gives a bad flavor to their cream, they fall off in flesh and do poorer work the rest of the year and the pasture is injured by too early pasturing. Buy grain or mill feed if short. If all the manure is hauled direct to the field the fertilizer value of the feed will help pay for it, and the above mentioned losses will be prevented. It pays to buy a little feed when short.

MANUFACTURING: From the manufacturing of butter on the farms to manufacturing in co-operative creameries was the most advanced step ever made by farmers from the standpoint of increasing the price of their product. It was due to the fact that farmers working together could do things that they could not do singly.

MARKETING: Co-operative creameries got a splendid start in marketing their butter in the early years. They made good butter aud it was at the time the dairymen of the Eastern states were turning from the sale of butter to the sale of milk. The East had to look to the Middle West for their butter. The creameries supplied it.

Are You Ready

When your Children Cry for It

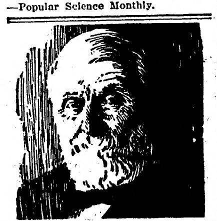
Baby has little upsets at times. All your care cannot prevent them. But you can be prepared. Then you can do what any experienced nurse would do—what most physicians would tell you to do—give a few drops of plain Castoria. No sooner done than Baby is soothed; relief is just a matter of moments. Yet you have eased your child without use of a single doubtful drug; Castoria is vegetable. So it's safe to use as often as an infant has any little pain you cannot pat away. And it's always ready for the crueler pangs of colic, or constipation or diarrhea; effective, too, for older children. Twenty-five million bottles were bought last year.

Fletcher's CASTORIA

Are Thin Men Smarter?

Do thin men have the most brains? Recent investigations at Lafayette college, Easton Pa., seems to answer "yes." It was found that those who were underweight stood higher in their studies than those who were normal or overweight. The study was made under supervision of Prof. H. E. Brown, director of physical education.—Popular Science Monthly.



SAME PRESCRIPTION HE WROTE IN 1892

When Dr. Caldwell started to practice medicine, back in 1875, the needs for a laxative were not as great as today. People lived normal lives, ate plain, wholesome food, and got plenty of fresh air. But even that early there were drastic physics and purges for the relief of constipation which Dr. Caldwell did not believe were good for human beings.

The prescription for constipation that he used early in his practice, and which he put in drug stores in 1892 under the name of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, is a liquid vegetable remedy, intended for women, children and elderly people, and they need just such a mild, safe bowel stimulant.

This prescription has proven its worth and is now the largest selling liquid laxative. It has won the confidence of people who needed it to get relief from headaches, biliousness, flatulence, indigestion, loss of appetite and sleep, bad breath, dyspepsia, colds, fevers. At your druggist, or write "Syrup Pepsin," Dept. BB, Monticello, Illinois, for free trial bottle.

Early Use of Paper

Europe made paper in the Eleventh century, England in the Fourteenth century. The first paper made in the United States was by David Rittenhouse in 1690. The mill still stands in Fairmount park, Philadelphia.

By good management, one can almost escape from being uselessly annoyed by telephone.

Why He Succeeded

Honored politically and professionally, during his lifetime, Dr. R. V. Pierce, whose picture appears here, made a success few have equalled. His pure herbal remedies which have stood the test for many years are still among the "best sellers." Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is a stomach alterative which makes the blood richer. It clears the skin, beautifies it; pimples and eruptions vanish quickly. This Discovery, or "G M D", of Dr. Pierce's puts you in fine condition. All dealers have it in liquid or tablets.

Send 10 cents for trial pkg. of tablets to Dr. Pierce's Clinic, Buffalo, N. Y. and write for free medical advice.
